CHAPTER XXII

TURKESTAN, By ANNETIE M B MEAKIN, FRGS

The principal inhabitants of Russian Turkestan, which lies to the north of M har istan and British India and to the south-east of the Caspian Sea, are called Saits. They have in their veins, not only the blood of the Indo-Germanic peoples, but also that of many other races that have successively conquered and G of the that territory. Persia by left her mark upon the Saits, the Arabs left behind them then religion, with the Koran and the Arabic language, traces of the Mongols

SART MUSICIANS

The most remarkable instruments in the band are the long copper trump to, which are only used on important occasions.

They are usually about nine feet long, and make a noise like the bellowing of a bull

are seen in the high cheek-bones and slanting eyes of those Sart families who call themselves Uzbegs , these look with some contempt on their more Persianized neighbours who go by the name of Tapks

The Sarts are the strictest Muhammadans in the world, they accept the sunna, or traditions, and the four Caliplis, as well as the Koran, whereas the Persians, who are Shiites, refuse to recognize any but Muhammad and his nephew Ah.

The Sarts diess to-day in a costume that was in vogue long before Muhammad came upon the scene, then ample turbans and flowing robes are quite Biblical, and remind the traveller of the stained-glass windows in our churches at home. In Persia the mullahs alone wear turbans, but in Bokhara and Khiva every man must wear one, and a girdle as well. The Afghan wears a girdle that may be used as his shroud, but in Turkestan it is the turban that is so employed. The Persian is free to shave his head or not, as he pleases, but every Sart must shave his head as soon as his beard begins to grow. No hair is allowed upon the upper lip, but the beard is never cut. Even

A SART BRIDE

No Sait woman will show herself out of doors without a thick horse hair veil and a long grey garment, which covers her from head to foot veil. The women of every respectable household have then own countyard, where they can take the an, and into which then windows look

Unmarried girls wear no head diess in the house, then thick and hixmrant han is straight. and parted in the middle, and hangs in numerous plaits upon the shoulders Sart woman makes her black eyebrows jonr by means of a dye obtained from a native plant I saw some high class ladies with a black-line drawn between the eyebrows and extending on either side of the face to the ears. The finger nails and palms of the hands are stained with henna. Many strings of coral are worn round a lady's neck on state occasions and heavy silver ear-rings, while amulets, adorned with turquoises or coral and glass beads, are hooked into the han above the ears. I came across a pail of nose rings in the bazaar, and saw a Jewish child buy one and fit it to her left nostril, like a pince-nez. The marriage laws are similar to those of Persia, with a few unimportant variations babies have their heads shaved as soon as they are a year old, but a gul's han is allowed to grow when she reaches the age of seven. Two little tufts of han are sometimes allowed to grow over a boy's ears, as a sign that his parents have made some special vow, and to these, in some cases, a thick plant of woman's han is attached

The women of Turkestan are still the most seclided of their sex in the world. From the age of nme to that of mnety no Sait woman who has any value for her reputation will show herself outside her own home without the complete disguise of a thick black horse-hair veil and a grey garment, with long, unused and tapering sleeves, covering her from head to foot (see illustration on this page). Rich and poor wear the same dress, and it is only by the quality and the cleanliness of her apparel that a woman of the upper classes is distinguishable from her poorer neighbours in the street. It is only in the seclusion of her own home that a Sart woman may be seen without that Indeous black

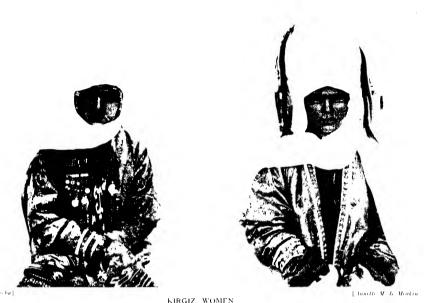

SAR1 DRESS

The Sart lady, who is standing with her two daughters by a native clay oven, has thrown back the horse hair veil which is naually worn

A SART ENTERTAINMENT

The Sarts spend most of their time idling, and are always delighted to find someone to perform for their pleasure. Here is a group of mess and boys seated along one of the town walls watching an athlete providing Tamusha, or entertainment, for them by walking on stilts

The Kirgiz are a hardy nomadic people, whose wealth consists almost entirely of camely, horses and cattle. The women do not yest their faces like the Saris and generally, lead a much free life.

The Sarts have a reverence for bread, as the staff of life, and think it wrong to "turn a loaf of bread on its back". It is a sign of wealth when a man piles his bread high before a guest. After Ramazan each family puts a piece of bread aside, to be kept till the next fast.

It is a custom among the Sarts that every young girl shall work for herself a marriage coverlet. The materials used are a coarse, canvas-like cloth and crimson silk, and the more closely the cloth is worked with red-silk embroidery the more costly the coverlet. Embroidery is the only needle-work that a Sart woman may do on a Friday.

The batchas, or dancing-boys, are an institution peculiar to Central Asia. These boys, who are selected for their beauty and girl-like appearance, travel from town to town in parties of ten or twelve, under a manager, who is often guilty of great cruelty to his young charges. By him they are lined out to entertain people with their dancing, and he often forces them to dance when they are almost dropping with fatigue. During the festivities of Ramazan they often have to dance the whole night. Then han is worn long, shorn off a little at the forehead, and this gives them a guilish look. They are dressed in brilliantly-coloured tunies of many hues, and loose trousers over which high leather boots are drawn. On their heads they wear small peaked caps fitting closely to the skull and embroidered in bright silks. As I watched some of them dance, then turbaned manager stood beside them with a lighted candle to show up their faces. The boys twiled round and round like spinning-tops, with arms uplifted, the speed of their revolutions increasing or decreasing according to the music. When the music ceased they sank upon their knees in a row

On account of the absence of hair on their heads all Sart boys wear caps, and even the grown men wear caps under their white turbans. The cap bazaar at Samarkand is one blaze of coloured embroideries. The Sart is inclined to be more luxurious in his diess, than in any other particular. If he can afford it, he will wear as many as half a dozen silken tunics one above the other, even in the hottest weather

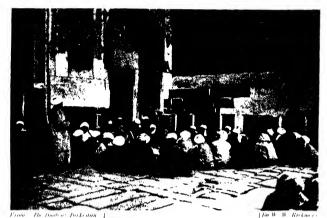

Every pious Muhammadan must wash his hands and month at least five innes a day, but the Saits are ready to perform this duty twenty times a day in hot weather, in addition to a weekly visit to the public baths. The Amir of Bokhara is the spiritual head of all the Muhammadan races in Contral Asia, he keeps up a certain amount of state whenever he appears in public, and travels with a considerable retinue when he visits the Russian capital. The hand-shake is a common form of greeting with the Saits, a man will not hesitate to star his hand to one below him in station. The shaking of hands is followed by a stroking of the beard with bodi hands, the equivalent of our hat-rasing. The rite of mitiation takes place among the Saits when a boy is between the ages of eight and cleven, and it is only after it has been performed, that a boy may wear a turban in place of his little embroidered cap.

The Sarts are very tatalistic, they meet death cannly, as the solid Allah. Then funeral rites are simple, as soon as life is extinct the jaws are bound with a cloth, and the relatives, joined by the persons who have come to lay out the body, start a loud wail. The body is then wripped in the white turban and carried to the mosque on an open bier by the male relatives. Each man carries a stick and a dark blue handkerchief as a token of mounting. There being no coffin, the grave, which is only three feet below the surface, is dug in such a manner that, when the body has been lowered into it, it can be shipped into a nuclic that has been previously hollowed out in the side, thus no cath is thrown upon it in filling up the grave. The head is always laid towards the north. For three days after there has been a death in the house the relatives are expected to

A DANCING BOY

In Central Asia it is common to find the frequenters of a tea-garden being entertained by dancing boys. These generally travel from town to town in parties of ten or twelve under a manager do no cooking for them selves, but to live on food brought to them from outside. Sart men do not put on moniming, but the women wear blue for slight, and black for deep, moniming

The Kngiz are a hardy, nomadic people dwelling in the steppe that lies between the northern boundaries of Tinkestan and central Siberia, they come into the Sart towns and are constantly met with in the bazais and markets. They are of the Uzbeg race, and call themselves Kngiz Kaizaks. They are a sturdy people, whose women do most of the hard work. You meet them unveiled in the streets seated astride their horses, with a large white head-dress. They live in encampments of movable tents, which they surround for protection from wild animals with a find wall. Then worldly goods consist almost entirely of camels, horses and cattle. They are compelled to remove their heids from the plains to the surrounding hills at the approach of simmer. The women put up and remove the tents, and the excuse for a Kingiz having more than one wife is that one woman would find it hard to get through all her work single handed. They lead a more moral life than the town-bred Sarts, but their Muhammadanism is far less strict, and they are not fanatical. Kumys, made from mares' milk, is consumed by them in large quantities, and their meat is principally horse flesh. They are splendid iiders, their stirrups are short and wide, they sit loosely, and can spring to the ground so easily that they are never thrown and dragged along the ground. They never shoe their horses, and sprins are unknown.

PRAYER TIME

After leaving the shores of the Caspian Sea, the Trains Caspian i all-way passes through the Turkoman desert before it reaches Bokhara and Samarkand, and its principal stopping-places there are

THE MAZAR AT GORIF

This mazar a holy grave combined with a praver house is quainful decorated with theix horns. The horn is the symbol of masculinity hence an object of adoration for barren women' and subsequents of greatness, power and sanctity. From the mast hangs a yak a tail the Turkoman towns of Askhabad and Mery. The Turkomans live in tents, made by hanging thick felt over a framework of willow withes. The interiors are often hung with their famous saiddle-bags and with valuable prayer-carpets, which give them a very cosy appearance.

The distinctive article of diess worn by the Turkoman, by which you can always distinguish him from his nomadic cousin the Kirgiz, is his tall, shaggy, black sheep's-wool cap, shaped like our English busby. When he doffs this fierce-looking cap and displays his closely-shorn head one seems to behold the metamorphosis of a wolf into a lamb, so startling is the effect produced. As with the Kirgiz, the Linkoman women go unveiled. They we illument massive pewellery I have ever seen, such as heavy breastplates studded with agates, and massive thimb rings, when decked out, they appear to be covered with silver. In fact, their husbands' money is invested in these silver ornaments and in the massive silver annilets, containing verses from the Koran with little silver bells attached which tinkle at every movement of the wearer. Examining the silver bracelets for sale in the bazaar, I found them heavy even to lift, and so deep that they would cover half a woman's forcarm. The necklaces reminded me of large dog-collars.

The Tinkomans are much addicted to wrestling matches. The onlookers form a wide circle and stand four and five deep to watch the players. Shouts appland every barefooted hero who succeeds in tripping up his opponent and bringing him roughly to the ground. Each wrestler places one hand on his opponent's shoulder and one on his hip. The stringgle begins with a slow, deliberate pressure, and scarcely any other movement, this exhibition of quiet force is the most impressive part of the proceedings. Bright silk handkerchiefs are handed to the victors by an impure, who leeps order, stick in hand

GAMES AT A LESTIVAL

In Turkestan at a festival the Sarts and Kirgiz often take part in a game not unlike polo with a sheep-skin instead of a ball. There are a great number of players on each side

The coffee maker, after roasting the berries pounds them in a wooden mortar with the rhythmic movements of the peatle clicking against the sides in an entertaining manner

CHAPTER XXIII

ASIA MINOR, PALESTINE AND SYRIA By G ROBINSON LEES, B.A., F.R.G.S

The population of this country is divided for political purposes by Turkish government officials into three classes, according to their religion. Muhammadans, Christians and Jews. There are differences in every class, they arise from race and residence. While Turk, Turcoman, Kurd, Circassian and Metawileh have certain characteristics peculiar to their race, religion amongst many of them is merely a nominal adherence to the principles of Islam. Some profess a corrupt form of Muhammadanism, others are strong in the faith, and wherever it is seen in practice it is reflected in their manners and customs. It is less apparent in the habits of the more primitive people of Palestine and Syria, and in some it is imperceptible. Yesidis are not reckoned in any class, and Druses also occupy an isolated position. It is not easy to express with precision the position occupied by the members of the various Christian bodies. Their names in some cases represent their religion, in some their race as well; in others no distinctive name can be applied which will adequately describe their position either as regards race or creed. The Armeman name is good to both church and race. The Syrian will answer for either church and race, or both. It depends on the person, and Maronite only refers to creed, and not to race. There are members of the Greek, Latin and Anghean churches in various parts of the country. Amongst all native Christians there is a similarity of custom, more picturesque perhaps, in those who are unedificated, and less noticeable in those who have been under Emopean influence. The lews are recognized in a general class, they have also particular marks of difference, and these refer to the circumstances under which they have lived and the condition of life in which they have been reared. The inhabitants of the country dwell in cities, towns, villages and tents, and the situation of their homes exercises an influence on their ways of life and to a large extent regulates their habits. In the towns Moslem women are kept in seclusion, and closely yielded when they appear in the streets, a white sheet covers the person and a small yiel the face of the native women whose husbands have no official connection with the government and occupy a very unimportant place in the social life of the city. This is also the outdoor costume of native Christian women. Those who belong to a higher rank, and the official class, wear a coloured garment instead of the white var. Outside the towns the veil is worn over the head and the face is exposed. In some districts a crown of coins is seen beneath the veil, and a married woman of Bethlehem has on her head a monumental and ornamental cap, hard and heavy

All the natives of the country, whatever may be their race or creed, can be readily distinguished by anyone familiar with their costumes, even details of dress are sometimes significant. The Askenazim Jew wears on the Sabbath a strummel, a round velvet cap with a fur border, the Sephardin a turban with a black lefty wound round his tarboosh or fez. A Muhammadan dressed almost like him has a white lefty instead of black, and a reputed descendant of M. hammad one of green. A religious Druse also wears a white lefty for his turban, with a portion hanging down

The inner garment of the Bedouin has long pointed sleeves, that worn by Fellaheen short sleeves

CUSTOMS RELATING TO BIRTH

THE birth of a child is an important event in

Amongst the Moslems it is awaited with serious and solemin anticipation When the birth is homly approaching, the father leaves his dwelling, after asking a friend to wait and bring him the news. If the infant is a boy he runs down the hill with the greatest glee, waving his arms and shouting at the top of his voice: "Bschara, Bschara!" i.e., "Good tidings, good tidings!" The anxiety of the father is soon dispelled, he sees and hears his friend, and hurries home to name the child. The babe is mimediately rubbed all over with salt, smeared with olive oil, and wrapped in swaddling clothes After seven days the child is unfastened, washed with fresh oil, rubbed again with salt, then bound up once more in the swaddling clothes. This continues for forty days, the child is then relieved of its infantile clothing and dressed in the ordinary garments of its parents, according to the sex The father makes a feast for his friends, who are all expected to bring presents. Every man, according to his means, will offer a sum of money, in some districts, for the benefit of the child, which in true Eastern fashion the father, who is also the collector, will appropriate for his own use. In many places the offerings are in kind, and should be something living

If a girl is born there are no good tidings. The messenger warks in a disconsolate manner down the hill, and the father knows there is a catastrophe at home The disappointing intelligence is broken gently to the sorrowing parent by a reference to the time when the innocent cause of his grief will have established a claim on his " Blessed be the regard bride" are words of hope. But the father refuses to be comforted, and usually accompanies his reply, "God bless thee," with an offer of the girl, which is not always an empty compliment. Hist meets with approval he answers " I accept". A sacrifice is then brought to ratify the betrothal, and the long waiting for the wedding begins But if the messenger declines, he supply says, "Thank you," and changes the subject

A girl is of little account until she is old enough to be The father then married takes an interest in her appearance and estimates her value, he considers himself a man of property, and is even able to obtain credit from the trader who supplies him with sugar, rice and coffee, on account of his possessions If he has three daughters he can reckon himself worth from forty pounds to one hundred pounds, according to their age and attractions attractions. But in spite of their intrinsic value, he will not count them in the number of his children when enumerating the members of his family. They are only girls after all, and will eventually leave their parental roof for the home of another man, to perpetuate the name of his family and add new honour to his clan.

On the birth of his firstborn son the father assumes a position of considerable importance and a new name. He is no longer known by the appellation that has hitherto distinguished him, but by that of his son. In future he will be "Abou Abdallah" (if the latter is the name of the boy), ie, "the Father of Abdallah".

In the desert, where man lives by his sword, the family must depend on him for its precarious existence. It is the man that controls its destiny, that upholds its honour, gives it a name, and maintains its right to fill a place in the history of the race.

This arrangement is according to the exigencies of life, and is found amongst all the nomads of the near East and the turbulent people who inhabit the hills and valleys beyond the reach of the Turkish arm of authority. When a boy is born, friends offer their congratulations and bring various presents according to their means. The gift of a slicep or a goat is the most acceptable form of

The father sacrifices a sheep or a goat if the child is a boy, as a thankful acknowledgment to Allah for the blessing received, and associated with this gratifude there is a hirking fear of future loss. Insisterities, therefore, partakes more of the idea of substitution than a simple display of pleasure. It is a life for a life, and in this way he hopes for the welfare of his son

The desire for children is very strong in the hearts of the women. They dread the densive laugh and the finger of scorii pointed at the "childless one," and resort to various means which they believe will assist them in the fulfilment of their hopes. Shrines are visited and wise women are

KILLING THE FATTED CALE

I whereword & Inderwood.

A fatted calf is sometimes killed on the return of a relative from a journey. Only a rich man could afford a calf. The victim is usually a lamb. When it is slain a feast is made, and friends as well as members of the family are invited. It is often used as an opportunity for making peace, a sign of reconciliation between neighbours who have been estranged by a deed of violence.

The bride is being conveyed, closely veiled, from her home to the bridegroom's house, annulsi great rejoicing, on the morning of the nuptial day. Triends and relations surround the animal on which she rides and the village band follows consulted. The most important shrine is Neby Dand, i|c, the Prophet David, meaning the place of the prophet, for here is the Wely, the so called tomb of David, a Moslein shrine visited annually by a large number of people. Every woman believes that the "Prophet" David will intercede on behalf of all who wish for children. They pray to God through him, and think if they make a vow and keep it be can obtain for them their heart's desire. A votive offering is generally indicated by a piece of cloth, it is made by the sacrifice of a lamb, which is slain by a holy man and its flesh distributed amongst the poor

Sometimes a lamb is taken by one man to show respect and devotion to another on the birth of a child. This custom—called "Kawad," a word derived from the leading of the sacrificial lamb is not looked upon as a religious ceremony, though it usually ends in a feast, and may be the fulfillment of a vow or pledge. It is often used as an opportunity for making peace, a sign of reconciliation between neighbours and friends whose relations have been strained by strife and bloodshed, and often other motives of personal interest are attached, for the one that "leads" the sacrifice expects a reward, which, according to custom, must be a garment

MAKRIAGE CUSTOMS

These vary according to the religious belief of the contracting parties, but in almost all cases the dowry is the most important factor in the negotiations which precede the nuptial ceremony. Amongst the Jews it is paid by the parents of the bride, and becomes a serious impediment to subsequent divorce. The laws regulating marriage are made by the Rabbis, and will depend in a great measure on the state of civilization that has been reached by their people. Amongst the more ignorant of the lower orders at the time the marriage contract is signed a paper of divorcement may be obtained, and for the two together discount is allowed. The possession of this paper will enable the husband to maintain his authority over his wife and cause her to submit more willingly to his rule. If a man is disappointed in his wife he may even exercise his power to get rid of her for a badly cooked dinner. He gives her the paper bought from the Rabbi and tells her to go. But the divorce will not be complete without the return of the dowry, unless the wife is guilty of a misdemeanour which brings dishonour upon the union.

It is a sin for a young man to remain immarried, and poverty is no excuse when the dowry is furnished by the bride. It is a disgrace to the family for a daughter to be unmarried, and an indigent widow will appeal for contributions towards the dowry of her daughter.

On the day appointed for the betrothal the bride and bridegroom meet together with their parents, friends, sometimes a Rabbi and the scribe who has t prepare the mairiage or itract. When this is is dy the fathers shake hands in the presence of witnesses who are not related to them The contracting parties are then asked if they con sent to the arrangements If they answer in the alfirmative, the bridegroom takes a glass filled with wine and says "Blessed be Thou, O Lord, King of the World, who hast sanctified us with Thy commandments " this solemii declaration he drinks a little wine and gives the glass to the bride Earthen pots are brought in, or a glass, and thrown on the floor and broken, while the guests cry " Good luck!" This signifies that as the pieces can never be put together again the approaching umon must never be dissolved more numerous the frag ments and the greater will be the happiness and prosperity of the married pair. The betrothed couple then receive from then parents two of the broken pieces Amongst some of

Amongst the Moslem peas ants all marry young, and as every gul knows she will one day become a bride, as soon as she can sew she prepares for the great occasion a garment of needlework is no fixed time, marriage depends on means, not age Poor men cannot afford to marry young, although there is a prospect of overcoming the obstacle raised by poverty If a youth has a sister, he can exchange her for another man's sister, and both wedduigs take place on the same day with one feast. The most important part of the marriage proposal is the sum offered as Amongst the poorest class this is really the price paid for the girl, which her father greedily appropriates without the least consideration for provision of propriety, rejoicing in the discovery that a girl is of some use and value

It sometimes happens that a man cannot raise a large sum of money, his position will not admit of saying, or perhaps he desires to espouse the young daughter of a friend, one too young for marriage. He then agrees to pay the dowry by instalments, which will terminate when the bride is fourteen years of age. The writer had a manservant who paid in this way three shillings and fourpence per month. He commenced when the child was six years of age, and at one period he was in terror lest the father should succumb to a severe illness, as he then would have had to begin again and pay the brother, who would possess the power of disposal of his sister's hand in marriage.

After the betrothal, a week before the nuptial day, the festive proceedings begin. Night after might friends and relations assemble on the village threshing-floor or in the courtyard of the home, and entertain one another with iddles or dancing, chiefly the latter. Men and women join in the "bear dance". It is represented by a man, who poses as a bear in the middle of a semicircle of women. He makes a guttural noise like a loud grunt while the band plays, and as a village band consists chiefly of drums, because they make the most noise, he has to grunt as fond as possible, keeping time with his feet in a forward movement towards the women, who clap then hands to the rhythmic sound of the drums and answer his grunts with a shall noise, thus pretending to keep the bear away from the yillage and prevent its capture of the gul 1 ide.

The sword dance is for men, who follow somewhat similar anties, with addition of various ridiculous attitudes and clashing swords to frighten away the evil spirits which are supposed to injure the bride and bridegroom. (See illustration on page 602.)

Many invitations are sent for the wedding, according to the rank of the bridegroom. At one marriage feast one hundred and sixty-two sheep were kalled and eaten at supper. On the morning of the great day the bride is fetched from her father's house by a large number of the young men, accompanied by the band. She's placed on a camer or a horse, covered with a veil and decked out for the occasion. Slowly the cavalcade winds round the hill on which the village stands, guins are fired, and these, with the bounds of the drims and the hours of the multitude, form part of the festival. (See this tration on page 600.)

The crowd conducts her to the bridegrooms house await his coming. There with her temale relations and friends she spends the day, while the bridegroom and the guests in dulge in various manly exercises and sports Towards evening the feast is ready and all the guests prepare for an musual amount of food. The bridegroom occupies a raised position overlooking the company, and the governor of the feast, the master of the coremonies, continues to devote lumself with assistants to the comfort of the guests. When the food has been consumed and no man appears able to eat any more, the presents are collected Everyone invited to the wedding is expected to bring a present, which is always in cash. To stimulate the generosity of the givers, as each present is received the attendant calls out his name in a loud voice and a much larger sum than the amount of the present, and invokes a number of blessings on his family. When all the presents have been collected, the governor of the feast informs the bridegroom. He rises to his feet and walks towards his home. As soon as he stands the drums are beaten and gnus are fired to proclaim his coming, and the waiting maidens leave his house with their lamps burning. As lamps are not used in a village home for the purpose of illimination, it is necessary for all who assemble to bring their own, with oil to replemish them, as they do not know when the bridegroom will appear. That depends on the number of his guests. The house would be too dark for enjoyment without additional light. The dun shinning of the lamp, a small pottery vessel like a explate her guilt if she has trifled with her maiden honour, or if she ever violates her mairiage vow, or even fails in her duty as an obedient and duti ful wife. All parties then enter the house, the bude afterwards goes to the bath, where she spends the day with her companions, the young men mount their horses and enjoy their favourite games, while their elders remain smoking and drinkine coffee in the house of the bride's father

On the might of the wedding the women conduct the bridegroom to the nuptral chamber, where the bride awarts him covered from head to foot with a red veil spangled with gold, removing this, he presents her with the tauton, and places it on her head, where it remains for the rest of her life. The moment the veil is uplifted the attendants run out of the room screaming in curious guigling tones into their own apartment, where they continue their discordant music for hours

The men, in another room or open conrivard, perform the sword-dance in various ludicious attitudes, slashing their swords and knives to drive away the Jan and all evil spirits from the future of the newly-married pair. Every Druse has absolute power over his wife and may divorce her with a word, but he tarely takes advantage of his position, and divorces are very infrequent, seldom occurring without any grave cause. The woman who is convicted of conjugal infidelity is invariably punished with death, not by her husband. The sends her to her parents with the dagger she gave him when they married but by her relations themselves, her guilt reflects shame on them, not on him, for according to the Druses "dishonour follows the line of blood." The death penalty is rarely inflicted, because their customs are becoming less rigid. The landor is still often used for the marriage ceremony, but it is becoming less frequently worn afterwards.

The tantoor is a tube of silver, sometimes even tin, according to the wealth of the wearer, measuring in size from a diameter of an inch and a half at the smaller extremity to three inches at the other end, where it terminates like the mouth of a trumpet (see illustration on page 603). This ornament is the peculiar and distinguishing sign of the matron. Maidens are never allowed to wear the honoured emblem, with certain rare exceptions in favour of those belonging to important families, and these privileged girls wear their horis in a way that no native can mistake them for married women. The broad end of the tantoor is fixed to a pad on the top of the head by two silk cords, which after being wound round the head hang beland nearly to the ground, terminating in large tassels which among the better classes are capped with silver. The narrow end commonly projects over the forehead at an angle of forty-five degrees, like the horn of an unicorn, and in this position it might indeed serve as a weapon of defence. The mode of weating it is subject to endless variations, and these diversities afford as many distinctive marks by which a person familiar with the country and its curroans car immediately determine to which district or faction belongs the husband of any woman he meets. This singular ornament is not even laid aside at might, its inconvenience being a matter of arrangement, but it is fast disappearing, and is scidon seep except as riche of the past in the homes of Druse women for use at the marriage ecremony.

Customs of the World

All people in Asia Minor, Palestine and Syria turn to Jerusalem as a centre of their worship. It is the holy city of Christians, Jews and Muhammadans, its native name "FI Kudo," i.e., "The Holy," indicates the estimation in which it is held, and there icligion is the predominant feature of the multitudes who assemble within its walls from every part of the country. The ceremones associated with their faith attract crowds of pilgrims, who join in the oscentations display of their feelings towards the various religious observances.

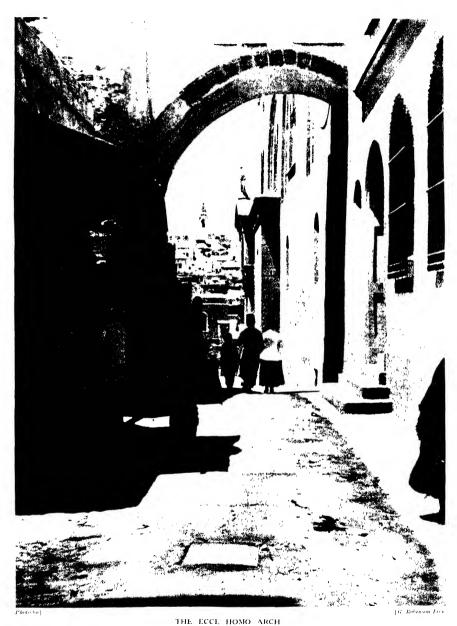

The Wailing Place of the Jews has drawn for centuries thousands of these devout people to weep over the stones of their lost inheritance (see illustration on page 515). All, however, do not meet in sorrow. There are occasions of rejoieng. Pinim, the festival kept in commemoration of the discomiture of Haman and the advancement of Mordecar, is a delightful time. Children also enjoy themselves at this feast, as all kinds of sweetmeats are made in the shape of shoes, shippers and hats, and distributed among them. And when the Book of Esther is read in the synagogue, and the congregation hear the name of Haman, they stamp with their feet and shout, "Let his name be blotted out," the children outside shake the rattles provided by their parents, and knock against the wall with wooden hammers. The only feast they keep in anything like its primitive simplicity is the "Feast of Tabernacles," when booths made of reeds and branches of trees are creeted on the roofs of their houses, balconies, and even in gardens, and decorated with fruit, according to the directions given in Neh viii. (See illustration on page 613.)

The Sakhrah, the great rock under the Dome, known by the name familiar to Europeans as the Mosque of Omar, but to residents in the East as the Dome of the Rock, is the centre of attraction to Muhammadans. All are enjoined to visit this rock and walk round it three times, they are then assured that their prayers will be answered. According to Moslem legend, it is the first part of the world that was created, the rest of the earth being added to it. It is said that Muhammad met here all his predecessors in the Prophetic office and from thence went to heaven. The rock followed him, but was arrested on its journey by the Angel Gabriel eighteen miles away from the earthis now balanced in mid-air, and if a listener to the tale of the attendant expresses his incredulity, he is immediately taken to the cave below, where the guide will stamp his foot to prove his assertion Should the question be asked why there is the payement to hide the view, he will be informed that it was necessary to prevent the women from gossiping with the spirits of the departed who are all buried beneath. On this rock the Angel Israfil will blow the last trimpet on the Judgment Day According to tradition, the tock was a threshing-floor owned by two brothers (see 2 Sam When the division of corn had been made the brethren slept in turn with the produce While the elder watched he reasoned thus "After such a plentiful harvest I am of their fields indeed rich, having not only wife and children, but more than sufficient corn to supply their needs, whereas my brother has neither wife nor child to clieer his loneliness. I must make it up for him in some other way. At least I can give him a bigger share of corn." He then removed a quantity from his own heap to that of his sleeping brother. When the younger awoke soon after and looked at his corn, he said to himself. "What shall I do with all this wheat? I have no one to help me to eat it, and there is more than enough for me. My brother has a wife and family, and therefore ought to have a larger share, but if I suggested it he would refuse. I will give him some of mine now." In the morning both were surprised to see their corn as they had left it the right before. And as they were gazing in astonishment at their equal shares, a prophet appeared, who told them what had passed in the right, and that God, who was aware of their kindly brotherly feeling, had decided to make their threshing floor the place of prayer for all the world.

The enthusiasm of the populacy is aroused, and multitudes assemble to witness the gay scene. (See illustration on page 616):

christian festivals are naturally associated with the Chinch of the Holy Sepulchre, where there were originally only two holy places—the place of criticalization and the place of resurrection. Since these were covered by the chinch, adoitional hely places have been made to represent the details connected with the great triagedy of Calvary, the death of our Lord Jesus Christ. Many people regard them as read, but this was not the intention of those in charge. Under the rock where two altais mark the site of Calvary is a shrine known as the tomb of Adam. Its position is due to the symbolical teaching of Scripture by the Greek Chinch. The words in St. Paul's epistle to the Corinthians, "As n. The most imposing is the Washing of the Feet, when the Greek Patriarch washes the feet of twelve Bishops to show the act of our Lord. Pilgrims anxions to light their candles seek their places hours and even days before the event. A strong guard of Moslem soldiers, with rifles and side-arms, are early placed in the church, while another company from the garrison is stationed in the courtyard of the entrance, and a third is kept in reserve in the nearest barracks. Every precaution is thus taken by the city authorities to quell any disturbance that may possibly arise from a provocative company of religious antagonists. Before noon the church is full of a motley crowd. They are quiet at first, until the wearness of waiting exeites the hostile visitors and, to beguile the time, they crack coarse jokes, while the native Greek Christians chant the following words.

This is the tomb of our Lord, The seventh day is the fire and our Feast, And this is the tomb of our Lord

Many are in this way worked into a freuzy, and the surging crowd rises and falls like the wayes of the sea. When the dignitures of the church appear, all gorgeously arrayed in their vestments of silver and gold, the confused mass of people is pushed back to open a space wide enough for the procession to match round the tomb. After this has been done three times annidst the wildest enthusiasm, the Patriarch enters the Holy Sepulchre, and a torch soon issues from the hole in the side. It is instantly grasped by a stalwart man waiting to carry it to Bethlehem. In his endeavours to reach the door on the shoulders of friends a scene of the greatest confusion arises. Flame after flame bursts from the tomb, and a forest of arms mingled with fire and smoke creates a spectacle, which baffles description. Gradually portions of the crowd leave the church with candles burning and heartfelt rejoicing

THE SAMARITAN PASSOVER

THE Samaritans, the oldest and smallest sect in the world, numbering less than two hundred, live in Nablus, a city in Central Palestine, and still worship after the manner of their forefathers on their holy mountain. Mount Gerizini, which overlooks their home. The Passover ceremony is the most interesting of all their rites, and is conducted on the plan set forth in Exodus xii

Their tents are pitched as near as possible in two lines, the oblong tent of the tabernacle, being the most important, is fixed close to the place of sacrifice which is next to that of the high priest. On the evening of the minth day of their sojoinn in the holy place, and the fifteenth of the month Nisan, the men having already prepared the lambs for sacrifice by care and constant washing, the final preparations are complete (see allustration on page 609). The men and boys are dressed in white cotton shirts and tronsers, and the women, who remain in the tents, wear then best clothes

Fire is placed in a trench opposite the taberracle, over which two condrons are fixed for boiling water during the reading of the blaw. Near the end of the trench, away from the taberracle, there is a circular pit, bordered by loose stones, about six feet deep and three feet wide, in which a fire is kindled for burning the sacrifice.

Two hours before smiset the nink portion of the Saivantan people assemble in the fabernacle tent, with the exception of the Shocheton, the young men whose duty is to kill the lambs and watch the boiling wa cr, and two others who attend to the fire in the pit. the proceedings—Officers and soldiers from the Turkish garrison are there to preserve order, a necessary precaution, which has to be purchased by a substantial payment from the slender purse of the Samaritan community, unless they are prepared to abandon the feast.

At sunset the reading of the "law" is finished, and as the lambs are brought to the Shochetim for slaughter, the remainder of the Samaritans gather round the victims (see illustration facing page 585). At a given signal each lamb is seized, thrown on its back, and the sacrificial knife drawn once across its throat. The blood spurts from the wound, the Paschal lamb rolls over, and after a brief struggle, expires.

READING THE LAW

[The American Colonia, Jerusalem

On the forchind of the Rabbi is bound a phylactery and over his head the tallith with fringes, following literally the directions of the Law of Moses respecting the Word of God. All devout Jews follow this custom from the age of twelve years, when a Jew becomes a son of the Law and capable of taking part in the synagogue service prevalent, even education has not totally eradicated the idea, and where people live without any civilizing influence the belief is very strong

The universality of this superstition goes far to prove it has what may be termed a natural origin, and when we consider that the eye is the most expressive organ of the scal or mind of man, that through it is shot forth, as it were, into the visible world of the senses the hidden passions and desires of our nature, we need not wonder that in those early ages when men could give no account of physiological actions, and nothing was known of man's rational being, the eye should have been superstitiously miagmed to be the central acers y of a malignant influence

Modern Calvary in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, Jerusalem, on which are now two alters and the last 'Stations of the Cross'.' The alters belong to the Greek and Latin Churches. A hole in the wall between them shows the natural rock on which they have been placed.

The eye is as potent to ignorant people, whose minds are full of fanciful interpretations of natural laws, as superstition may conceive, the error arises from a lack of understanding of its operation, rather than a recognition of its power. The person who felt himself under the spell of a histories eye, with a penetrating gaze, would be too agitated calmly to consider the cause of his terror, and attribute to another the results for which he himself was mainly responsible. The uncommon colour of an Eastern eye might enhance this feeling and cause the victim to regard it as the means of conveying a malevolent influence. Hence the fact that blue eyes amongst the inhabitants of Palestine and the surrounding countries have always been responsible for consequences disastrous to those who have been subject to their gaze. It is really the man who is smitten with terror that gives to the eye of the other its baneful power, and he fears less the force of character behind it than the fancies with which his own timidity have invested it.

The safest and best cure for the "evil eye" is supposed to be a bit of clothing from the man or woman through whom the permicious element has passed, and to burn it below the victim. The finnes will immediately remove the ill-effect. Another method adopted by Muhammadans is to take

CUSTOMS RELATING TO DEATH AND BUREAU

WHES the hand of death is laid on the inhabitant of a village cries of wee and shrieks of distress awake the slumbering people and re-echo through the vales of the surrounding country. The women rend their clothes, tear their hair, and exhibit all the familiar signs of mourning

The clothes of the deceased are removed, the paws are bound up, and the eyes closed. The Khateeb washes the body, covers it with a sheet, and places the corpse on a bier. If the death took place in the morning interment follows the same day; but if the deceased expired in the evening the burial is performed on the following morning.

Professional mourners are hired to follow the remains to the grave. Lamentations are continued from the moment of death, and the women of the village join in the melancholy task of wailing for the departed.

THE MOHURRUM LESTIVAL, PERSIA.

A hole is hastily dug in the cemetery, the resting-place of the village fathers, the body is carried on a bier by the men, walking at a moderate pace and chanting meessantly the Mosleni profession of faith. "La illaha illallah. Muhammad rasool illah. Sallallahu aleyeh was illem." ("There is no Deity but God. Muhammad is the Apostle of God. God favoni and preserve him.")

Words of praise are intered of the dead in feeling tones as the body is laid beside the sepulchre, then the Khaleeb calls on the spirit of the departed to answer as he would in the presence of God, and say he has been a de-ont Moslem. In his stead a releave replies. "He beheved in one God and Muhammad the Apostle of God." The body is laid in the grave and covered with earth. Women weep at the tomb all, the day and visit it every day until a headstone marks the place. It is

A death in a nomad camp causes more distress than the loss of a life in battle or raid, there is the painful vigil through long, anxions days and weary nights, till the tension is broken. The deceased is wrapped in a shroud of white calico, whether he is a prince of the Arab or a poor wandering Bedawy, and his corpse is laid in a shallow pit, over which a heap of stones is piled to keep it safely in the grave from the birds of the air and the bests of the earth. A headstone sometimes marks the place of rest, and the rude sculptures of the miskilled Bedawy artist adoin it, showing forth the particular virtues of the departed and the estimation in which he was held. If he was a sheakh noted for his generous dealing with his fellow men, a coffee-pot indicates their appreciation of his hospitality.

The grave in the earth or the pit below the shifting sand of the desert is the kingdom of the dead. The treatment of the corpse is the same as amongst all Muhammadans. It is washed, wrapped in its winding-sheet, and laid in the grave, in the simple way of a primitive people, with neither ceremony nor the ostentations trappings of woe seen in the more civilized parts of the country. A man's kinsmen sacrifice at his grave a ewc, without sprinkling the blood, they boil and distribute the meat to the funeral company. No sacrifice is made for a woman, but the corpse is sprinkled with perfumes when it is carried out of the camp.

Graves are frequently visited by the women, who weep for the dead. A widow will lead her children thither and teach them to mourn the loss of their father, while she bewails her dead in a forced, suffociting voice and violent sobbing.

- " Ya habeeby !" (" Alas, Beloved !")
- " If evley weyley ! " (" Woe is me!")

In towns and more important villages the funeral ceremonies are more elaborate and conducted according to the religion of the people. In Jerusalem the Jewish dead are always buried on the slope of the Mount of Olives (see illustration on page 625), and Muhammadans on the opposite side of the Kedron Valley, where they believe all the dead will rise on the Judgment Day. There is a small portion of a column jutting out of the eastern wall of the Haram enclosure, the old Temple Area, which overlooks this valley, from whence the bridge of Es Sirat will cross it as thin as a horsehair. Muhammad will sit astride this stone on the great Day, and all bad Moslems will be left amongst the unbelievers on the other side, but their prayers and protestations will be heard by him. He will, in response to their request to be removed, turn them all into fleas, cross the bridge as a sheep, and bring them over in his wool into Paradise.

Tiii Persians possess a civilization dating from the sixth century before Christ, and their customs to-day are based on those of their ancestors who served Cyrus the Great, a leading figure in the book of Isaiah.

To bear cliddren is the fondest desire of all true women in Persia, and with this object at Meshed a woman, on the last Wednesday of the month of Safar, collects, seven walnuts, seven almonds, seven leaves of a herb and three threads which are her measure in height. In the morning, accompanied by an old woman, she visits the famous stone Lion, and after some prayers have been read the nuts are broken and the woman passes three times under the Lion (see illustration on this page). This is the custom at Meshed and at Hamadan, but in other cities the grave of a recently-killed man is visited and the result is beheved to be equally efficacious. At Teheran the famous "Pearl Cannon" is visited for a similar purpose on the last Wednesday before the New Year. When a woman is on the road to reach her desire, she frequently craves to eat charcoal or a day known as Armenian earth. She is not periinted to cross a gravevard, nor may she enter a kitchen by might, as it is then haunted by Jimis. If by mischance she sees a delicacy which she cannot secure, the eyes of the child will be green. On the contrary, if she falls into water, the eyes of her baby will be large and histious. Should an eclipse of the moon occur the woman must not look at it, nor must she touch her body with her hands, as this would infallibly produce a black mark on the body of the child.

I have referred to the Koran, the scriptures of the Moslem, and I now propose to deal very briefly with the religion of the Persians. They are members of the Moslem faith founded in the seventh century of our era by Muhammad the Prophet of Mecca, whose cry was "There is no God but Allah". Muhammad is the Prophet of Allah". In this religion, known as Islam or "Resignation to the Will of God," there are two great divisions. The Sumus or "Traditionists," who constitute the vast majority of the Moslems of India and Turkey, are opposed to the Shassor "Factionists," and as most Persians are Shias, some details of then belief are called for —After the death of the Prophet, Ali, his cousin and som in law, who, the Shias aver, had been appointed his successor by Muhammad, was thrice passed over in favour of his rivals for the Caliphate. He was shortly afterwards assas smated and his unfortunate son Husain, when trying to assert his rights, was deserted and slain on the plain of Kerbela. This tragedy caused such intense feeling for the house of Ali that he may be considered to be the Pation Saint of Persia. It is said that "Muhammad was a city of knowledge and Ali the gate to that city." In other words, Ali is placed almost on a level with the Prophet, His descendants, the twelve Imam or "Leaders by Divine Right" are considered to be the only true Spiritual Leaders, and this feeling is intensified by the belief that the Imam Husain married a daughter of the last king of the Sasanian line, and his descendants thereby inherit the "Royal Splendour" of the Sasanians, who claimed the divine right of kings under this term. On these premises the first three Caliphs are naturally cursed as usurpers, and the division between Shia and Sunni is both deep and bitter.

To keep the tragedy of Kerbela from being forgotten, every year in the month of Mohurrum Passion Plays are performed which excite men and women to such deep feelings that it is by no means uncommon for the actor representing. Shimi, who actually slew the Imam. Husain, to be assassmated (see illustration on page 631). On the tenth day, the day of the tragedy, there are processions of men and boys from every quarter, which parade the streets beating their breasts in thythm and lamenting "O Hasan!". O Husain!". These processions are headed by fanatics clad in shrouds, who cover themselves with chains, horse-shoes and daggers all fastened to their skin, and crying out, cut themselves, as indeed every one is encouraged to do. (See illustration on page 633.)

At Yezd, a remote and especially fanatical city, an enormous structure representing the bier of the Imam, decked with flags, mirrors, swords and daggers and diaped with shawls, is slowly carried round the City Square by five hundred men of the neighbouring village of Mohamedabad. No one who has been a spectator of these Passion Plays can fail to be moved at the intense depth of feeling which is displayed, and there is little doubt that, so long as these moving dramas are recited and acted. Persians will continue to hate the Sunni and will refuse all advances towards reconcibation

In the England of Chaucer thousands of pilgrims visited the tomb of Thomas à Becket at Canterbury, and in Persia, which is still a mediaval land in many ways, pilgrimages flourish. The sacred city of Persia, the glory of the Shia world, is Meshed, where, under a golden dome, he the mortal remains of the eighth Imam Riza. The Caliph Mainini, son of the famous Harun-al-Rashid, who also is buried at Meshed, made the Imam his heir in acknowledgment of the claims of the house of Ah. This act aroused such a storm of opposition at Baghdad that the Caliph not only revoked his act, but even poisoned the hapless Imam, the scene being portrayed in many a Persian picture. For devout Shias a pilgrimage to Meshed is the crowning event of their lives.

The pilgrims travel in large caravans under the guidance of a Chaish or leader, who is supposed to be the bravest of the brave and to act the part played by Greatheart in the "Pilgrim's Progress." Rich pilgrims are accompanied by mullahs or Moslem priests, who recite prayers or portions of the

At length, however, the fortunate pilgrini who has safely traversed the terrible Lift and escaped the gines of robbers which are such a terror for innarined parties, reaches the "Hill of Sahitation," and looking down on the Sacred City binied in green gardens, espies the sheen of the golden dome with its peciless golden innaries and joins with tears of joy in the prayer which runs. "Peace be on you, the members of the Prophet's family, the Seat of the Messenger of Alto). Marriage in the East is naturally an earlier affair than in the West, where men and women mature less rapidly. At the same time, to many a boy of fourteen to a girl of eleven, as is frequently done, is a mistake, but the general feeling in Persia, where the patriarchal system obtains, is to receive the daughter in-law young in order that she may accustom herself to her new family with less difficulty than would be the case if she were older. The result of this feeling is that a girl of twenty is unlikely to find a husband, both for the above reason and also because she would be viewed with suspicion as having some defects. Generally speaking, when a youth approaches his eighteenth year his mother takes up the question of his marriage most seriously. If possible a cousin is selected, as she will already be at home among her relations, but failing this, special agents are employed, and when a girl of suitable family, age, and fortune is found the mother and her sister make a formal call. The recipient of the visit, to enhance the importance of her family and to gain time, generally makes formal and vague excuses, but if the matter is intended to go further the girl is asked to bring sugar and water. She returns, puts on her best clothes, and when she returns she is embraced and most carefully scrutinized by the visitors, who even try her raven locks to see that they are all her own. A long consultation now ensues, in which the girl takes no part, and both sides exaggerate

A PURIFICATION CEREMONY

On the road from Teheran to lipahan travellers have to undergo purfication which is effected by their passing beneath a copy of the koran which is suscended over the road.

The ceremony takes place near the holy city of Num to prepare pulgrims who are going to visit the tomb of Fatima, the daughter of Ali with true Persian imagination the qualities and position of the young people. This first call is brought to a close by sweetnears being handed round

A pause ensues, during which the women frequently arrange for the girl to see the prospective bridegroom, which is easily managed when he rides out or walks. For the youth to see the damsel intended for him is quite incorrect, but is sometimes managed by his hiding in the Inderun, or "Inner Chamber," when "the beloved" accompanies her mother on the return call

There is much discussion over the downy, but when these important preliminaries have been satisfactorily settled, the betrothal takes place. In the morning gifts of pewellery and trays of sweetinears are sent to the bride's house and a lady of distinction, generally chosen for having a large number of sons, places the earnings in the cars of the beautifully adorned bride, but only the women of both families participate in this ceremony

The marriage takes place about two months later on an auspicions day fixed by the astrologer

MUHAMMADAN PRAYERS

[Henry D Allemagn

The devout Muhammadan prays five times a day at sunrise, during the morning, at midday, during the afternoon and at sunset. In towns a Muezzin calls the prople to prayer from one of the minarcts of the mosque.

Gifts are again sent, among them being a tray containing one hundred varieties of drigs and herbs, a minor and ten vards of white sheeting to cover the bride during the ceremony, also a pair of candlesticks, twenty pairs of shoes and several trays of sweetmeats are included.

The bridegroom visits the bath, from which he issues resplendent in new clothes. carefully shaved and with his nails dyed with The bride too, who has visited the bath on the previous day, is placed on a saddle facing towards Mecca with all her garments untied until the completion of the ceremony Opposite her is the mirror and the candlesticks, and the white sheet is draped over her head. mage deed. After this the agent of the bride proceeds to the cintain at the women's apartments and asks the bride three times whether she accepts the bridegroom at the named dowry. After this question has been asked for the third time, the bride, with much bashful hesitancy, replies in the affirmative, her agent then asks a lady whom he knows to be present if it is the bride who has replied. Upon being satisfied as to this, he returns to the assembly of the men and sits by the agent of the bridegroom. The latter now asks the former three times in Arabic for the hand of the bride on the terms given in the marriage deed. The agent of the bride replies three times in the affirmative, and upon this the marriage is declared to be completed and sweetineats are eaten. At the termination of the ceremony the bridegroom is taken to the women's apartments, where, after presenting a ring or other gift, he enjoys the felicity of seeing his bride's face in the unirror, and this is all

Before the bride is taken off to her future home there is another delay, while the furniture and clothes are being prepared, and at last the astrologic fixes an auspicious day for the final ceremony. In the afternoon the wedding gifts of furniture, clothes, cooking intensits and so forth are carried to the bridegroom's house on gaily caparisoned inules and on trays. After dark the male relations and friends of the bridegroom, followed at a short distance by his female relations, proceed to the house of the bride, accompanied by musicians and men bearing lamps and torches. Upon arrival the completed marriage deed is handed over to the bride's father. Meanwhile the bride has been carefully deplated, more especially on her back, as a han of the Angel of Death is beheved to grow there! She is then dressed in her bridal costinic

At last the wedding procession starts, the bride driving in a carriage and taking in her hand some bread, salt and cheese in a handkerchief. If it rains it is especially lineky in Persia. The bridegroom meets her near his house, and her female relations cry out. "We have accepted you." He then turns back ahead of the party. Sheep are sacrificed to avert the cyrl eye, and finally "the beloved" enters her future home, where great rejoicings are held, dancing-troupes being especially engaged on such occasions. Rue is binned before her in a brazier, and the bridegroom removes her outer gainent. Both then try to place then foot on that of the other, as whoever succeeds will rule in life. The lovers then wash each other's feet, and the veil is removed after a gift has been presented, and again they gaze at one another in the mirror. The cloth is now spread and the food brought from her home is partaken of, and each places morsels in the month of the other. A final gift is needed to induce the bride to speak. At last the relations depart, after helping the bride to undress, and the lover declaims some complimentary verses.

siastical jurists, is administered by the religious authorities. The common law, on the other hand, is unwritten, and is based on tradition and custom. It is administered by the civil authorities, whose decisions are given entirely according to their own ideas of right and wrong. Until quite recently no attempt has been made to check local governors, whose decisions have frequently been terribly critel. The universal punishment in Persia, which can be inflicted by governors, by teachers and by masters of households is that of the sticks, and the man who is punished is said to "eat sticks" (see illustration on page 640). He is thrown on to his back and his feet are tied to a pole termed the [alak, which is held by two men. Two other men then beat his uplifted soles with long willow rods. The punishment gives much room for bribery, and the victim, by promising a present to the [arrashes, as they are termed, can divert the sticks from his soles to the [alak, while he groans piteously to keep up appearances. The severity of this punishment entirely depends on the number of sticks to be broken and the spirit animating the [arrashes, but men occasionally die under it.

WANDERING MUSICIANS OF EASIERN PERSIA

The musicians bellow forth in nasal tones to the monotonous accompaniment of the hand drum, the legends of old Iran, and the deeds of their national heroes, or love-songs of questionable propriety. Thes wander gipsylike from place to place, and are known by the term "Luti," which signifies "wastreh," for, besite ministrels., they englisy other and less reputable means of earning a livelihood.

Customs of the World

Other punishments are equally cruel, brigands being built up alive into pillars, where they live in agony for days and serve as an awful and perhaps salutary warning. Shoeing with horse-shoes, impaling and flaying alive are still sentences carried out in Persia, although less frequently than twenty years ago. Blowing from a gun is also a favorite punishment. The lev talionis of an eye for an eye still prevails, and a murderer is often handed over to the family of the murdered man to be done to death. Upon the whole, the people of Persia are becoming less cruel than they were, and more civilized punishments are being substituted for the old code, which was too often administered in a corrupt and vin lictive fashion.

As may be readily imagined, Persians believe in imagic and are intensely superstitious. To kill an enemy a certain prayer has to be read for forty-one days, when, if the cause be just, the enemy dies. An equally efficacions means of ridding a man of his foe is to make an image, beat it day by day until the fortieth day, on which the head is cut off. Yet another method is to nail a piece of sheep's fat to a wall facing west in a disused cemetery. Wednesday is the auspicious day for this dark deed, and for every day up to forty days a pm is stuck into the fat, and as it wastes away, so does the enemy. In many authenticated cases men have heard of these magical arts, being used against them and have died from fright. When the death of an enemy is not desired, but only his unpopularity, a bone from the left rib of a dead donkey is pounced up and mixed with his food. If by mistake a bone from the right rib were used he would become amazingly popular!

A horse show brings linck in Persia, as in countries further west, and to ensure the arrival of the lov (a slice has his name scratched on it with a potent talisman. as this is placed on the fire the lover becomes restless and hastens to his beloved

Where polygamy is allowed there is much pealousy of the new wife, and to custice her downfall can'th from the grave of a mandered man and woman is procured and thrown into the house, after reading the chapter in the Koran which deals with the Day of Judgment. This potent spell ensures a quarrel between the husband and his second wife, and she cither returns to her family or is turned out of the house. Wives who wish to engage in love intrigues mix dired donkey's brains in their husband's food which makes him incapable of finding out then guilt.

To ensure an enemy holding his tongue, a thread of seven colours is taken to a marriage, and when the ectemory is performed knots are field on the thread and a prayer made that the tongue of the enemy may be field. The knotted thread is then placed under a heavy stone.

When all hope is abandoned, a Moslem is gently laid with his face turned towards Mecca and the "Yasm" chapter of the Koran is read. He is then called upon to make his will in the presence of witnesses, and after this is completed the scal of the dying mair is broken and placed at his right side. His shroud is prepared, covered with prayers written by forty-one men, who testify "O Allah, in truth we know nothing but good about this man—but Thou knowest his condition better". When the death-agony is passed the eyes are closed, the himbs are stretched, the great foes of both feet are field together and a scarf is bound round the head. The corpse is then placed on a bier, and after

After being washed the corpse is wrapped in the shroud and two green willow sticks are placed under the aim-pits. It is then replaced on the bier, and the nuneral procession, which is swelled by relations and friends, proceeds to the cemetery, a mullah reciting the "Al Rahman" chapter of the Koran on the way (see illustration on page 643). At the cemetery the funeral prayers are read, and the bier is laid at the foot of the grave. Thrice it is lifted from the ground and replaced, and at the fointh, time the corpse is lowered head foremost into the grave. The face is now uncovered, and

Earth is then piled up, and all present make marks in the soil with their lingers while reciting the opening chapter of the Koran.

The spirits of the Blest are taken to the "Abode of Peace" near Najai to await the Day of Judgment, but the spirits of the unworthy are taken to the Sahra'i Barahut near Babylon, there to undergo penance and purification against the same awfulday. Three days are kept for morning, on the first of which forty one men recite prayers termed the "Prayers of Alarin," to strengthen the deceased in facing Munkn and Nakn. On the second day the grave is visited by relations, and when a circle has been formed, a prayer for the forgiveness of all the prophets and saints is recited, and the relations stand in two lines and thank their friends for having come. On the third day a leading dryine brings the mourning to an end, and requests the relations to fasten up the opening in their shirts which they have torn as a sign of grief. On the fortieth day a tombstone is erected over the grave, and the relations return home, quoting suitable passages from the Koran.

CHAPTER XXV

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS By CHARLES HOSE, DSc, F.R.G.S.

INTRODUCTION

The Philippine Islands coetain perhaps the most confusing admixture of races in the world, and have led observers to make statements which are as widely conflicting as the ethnical divisions are various. There is no group of islands in the world which is peopled by a greater number of racial stocks or where race mixture has taken place more thoroughly or for a greater length of time. This commingling of tribes and races varies, as might be supposed, in different parts of the archipelago in relation to the attitude of the tribes towards each other, then disposition, geographical surroundings, and from the character of the succeeding invasions from the South and West. The natives, of whom there are more than eighty distinct tribes, are of the Malayan or brown race, the vellow, black and white races, and inhabit an archipelago numbering about three thousand islands, bounded west and north by the China Sea, east by the Pacific Ocean and south by the Celebes Sea and the coastal waters of Borneo.

The aborigines are of negro stock and are still found practising a primitive form of existence in the interior of the larger islands. They are of short stature and resemble in appearance the typical negro. A further description of these Negritos will be given later, as well as of the other races mentioned in this brief introduction, but a short summary of the different types is an essential preliminary to any sketch of such a mixed group of peoples.

The first invaders to distinb the security of the aborigines were. Indonesians, who shows the Negritos into the mountains and afterwards intermingled with them. The most interesting tribes of this stock are the Igorots, the Tingmans, the Bagobos and the Mandayas, though there are many others of almost equal importance.

To the Indonesians, who came principally from the manifand of Asia on its south-eastern extremity, and from Borneo and Sumatra, succeeded the Malays, amongst whom were certain "Moros" or Muhammadan Malays, now chiefly to be seen in Palawan and Minda In the sixteenth century Spaniards landed on the islands. and large numbers of Chinese crossed over to add to the population a further strain to a population which was already showing signs that the diversity of races had not precluded an anneable settlement of ferritory, or even infer-mar mage between its motley consti tuents. Thus there may now be found Negrito-Indonesians, Malayo-Indonesians, Malayo-Europeans and Malayo-Chinese

THE MIGRITOS

IN a description of this character it is not possible, nor indeed desirable, that a detailed description should be given of every grade in colour, every variation in custom among the natives. Enough will have been accomplished if the most typical tribe of each division is described, from whom the variations of the mode of social life, of the religion practised by the remainder can be apprehended. In consideration, first should come, as first they possessed the archipelago, the Negritos, who are also known as Acta—They form one branch of the Eastern as opposed to the African division of the pygniv race. Other branches of the Eastern division such as the Paphans and Andamanese have been described in Chapters I and VIII—The presence of Negritos over so wide an area has been accounted for by the theory that the entire oceanic region is a partly submerged continent, once connected with the Asiatic mainland and over which this aboriginal race spread prior to the subsidence.—Another opinion is that the peopling of the several archipelagos by the Negritos has been a gradual spread from island to island.

In one of the numerous dances of the Bontoc Igorots the men move in single file, each man carrying in his left hand a gamen, or bronze gong, which he bests with a drunstick. The gamens base human jaw bones as handles

SUBANUN WOMAN

The Subanuas are a large tribe inhabiting the western peninsula of Mindanao. The women are fond of ornaments, of which carriages bangles and necklaces are the most common

The Negritos are the aborigines of these islands, and form one branch of the Fastern as opposed to the African division of the psymy race

The men average not over four feet six inches in height and have frizzy han, a short, flat nose, roundish eyes, an almost black skin and abnormally long arms. Their physique, however, is fine, their cliests are broad, their limbs well proportioned and then bodies, as a whole, muscular - By way of ornament they sharpen then teeth and raise great sears on their bodies, and each group of people possess a mair or men who perform these operations with the dextenty due to long practice The men wear, as a rule, only a breech cloth and the women rarely more than a short skirt to the knees. The latter also adorn themselves with seed necklaces and sometimes beads, curious combs, feathers, flowers in the pierced ears and other similar objects. For special occasions in Palawan the back garments are often decorated with colonred designs, while flowers, brightly-coloured leaves and seed necklaces adorn the head and neck (See illustration on page 644)

They build only the indest shelters, which they descrit at pleasure. At times they make small cleanings in the jungle and plant rice or sweet potatoes, but a death or other cause for fear is quite sufficient to make their give up their fields and move to other parts. For the greater part of the year they live on the fish and game they can capture, and the roots and other products of the forest.

In such a prunitive community the first methods of making fire are used, which are too well known to need description. But in the island of Palawan a group of pagimes known locally as Batak practise an interesting variation. A strip of rattain is placed between a bit of bark cloth and a split stick, the rattain is then drawn rapidly up and down till the cloth is ignified. (See illustration on page 657.)

The Negrito is by instinct and habit a hunter. Indeed, his existence could not be maintained without hunting, upon which, therefore, we find all his ingenuity exercised. Though the environment does not supply a great variety of game, there are always plenty of deer and wild boars, numerous squinzels and other small mammals which can be eaten, and also a great variety of birds, such as pigeons, horibills and pheasants. Deer and pig the Negritos sometimes trap, but usually hunt in bands with dogs, showing a tircless energy in the chase. Women as Mr. W. A. Reed describes in his report on the Negritos of Zambales, occasionally take part in hunting, especially if dogs are scarce, and they run through the brushwood with lond cries. They casily distinguish by the barking of the dogs what game is aloot, as the way in which they give tongue when after a pig, and the practised car knows also when the pig is brought to bay. The privilege of resing the bow and arrow is reserved for the men. The Bataks of Palawan use chiefly the blowpipe.

After the successful determination of a limit the game is taken back to the village and cut up. But this is invariably preceded by an offering to the spirits of a portion of the entrails, this being done to feed as well as to appease them. The pieces are scattered in all directions and a few words of dedication uniffered. The entring up of the game is followed by a distribution of the various portions, which is smally regulated by custom, the man who first wounded the deer taking the head and breast, the man whose dog started the deer, a limit-quarter, and so on

Not very much is known of the general social life of the Negritos - The birth or the naming of a child is not made the subject of any special festivity. The naming is in most cases done on the day of birth, but it may be performed any time within a few days. The old men of the group, not the parents (though they may do so), usually select the name, which generally refers to some striking object near to the place of birth, or to some event or quality. Only one name is used and there is not any distinction between the names for the two sexes. If the child is sickly, the name is changed in the belief that the spirit inhabiting the place where the child was born is displeased at the name. If an attempt to propitiate the spirit was not made, it is supposed that the child would die

Marriages are arranged with regard to the value of the prospective bride. Good looks and good health in a grif are a valuable asset to her parents, which there would be son-in-law has to purchase. The transaction is usually carried out by the parents, but a grif is supposed to have some freedom of choice. The custom of exchange of brides also exists the brother and sister in one family

The actual ceremony varies from a somewhat elaborate ritual to a marriage of which there is practically no evidence at all, but a feast which is followed by dancing is generally held. In some districts the man and woman sit in the centre of a large circle of relatives and feed each other from a common dish. After the onlookers have acclaimed the action, the couple perform some act of service together, such as ministering to the wants of their relatives, typifying union in work as a mark of married life.

After the ecremony the bride and bridegroom spend a few days with the former's parents and then return home. Their return is celebrated by a further gift of presents to the bride, with dancing and with a show of festivity if the bridegroom has sufficient means to warrant such a display. His means also control the number of wives a Negrito may possess. There is no other restriction, but divorce is uncommon. If the man and woman and their families agree to a divorce, the property is divided equally, but the woman takes the children. Infidelity is severely punished, nominally with death, but rich offenders may make pecuniary atonement.

The morality of the Negritos is as a rule very high, and lapses from fruth, honesty and sobriety can be traced to the influence of foreigners. They have not, however, any very definite religion, though they people every place with the spirits of the dead and in adversity ascribe their inisforting to their agency. In prosperity the spirits are not much considered. Diseases are thought to be a punishment inflicted by the spirits for wrong-doing. In cases which are not serious, medicine-men attempt to cure the patient by exorcizing the spirit which is the cause of the evil. But this is not a very common practice, as the medicine-man is sometimes held to account if his remedies prove ineffectual. Apart from these means, the Negritos use charms to cure illness and to attract women. There do not seem to be any rain-makers nor any ceremonies connected with the weather except that of burning deer's bones to allay violent thunderstorms. They also believe in certain omens—to hear the cries of birds at night is considered especially unlikely.

The behef in spirits by which they are so deeply influenced does not lead them to perform claborate ceremonies at death, nor do they inter the dead with much outward manifestation of their religious opinions. The corpse is simply placed in a rough coffin or in a mat, and buried in the ground with a few precautions against the rayages of wild animals.

An account of the Negritos, however short, would be imperfect without some mention of their love of music and dancing, which is, of course, a common Negroid characteristic. Then musical instruments are of a primitive nature, being a flute made from bamboo, a jew's-harp and violin of bamboo and rude forms of guitars. Gongs, probably obtained from Malays, are found in some places. A favourite form of instrument is made from a small tree, which is stripped and supported on trestles (see illustration on page 645). The women line up and beat out a thythmical tattoo, while one or two men assist by beating on gongs.

Dancing is the principal amusement, and gives an opportunity for the Negritos to display then explorant spirits. Besides the ordinary steps, they have mimetre dances showing such things as the gathering of crops or the taking of honey from bees, and episodes relating to love and win

AN IGOROT TRIBUNAL

The council house of the village is forbidden to women and serves as a lounzing-place for men and as a dormitory for the unitarity youths. These institutions are found over a vast area of Asia as well as in Oceania. Strangers are lodged, and war trophies kept, in them.

As has been mentioned above, the first race to disturb the security of the aborigmes were the Indonesians, and they should be next described in an account of the customs of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

Amongst the many tribes that belong to this race may be mentioned the Tingmans, the Igorots, the Bagobos, the Subaniuis, the Hugaos, the Kalingas, the Mangyans, the Manobos and the Hongots

The natives who have been converted to Christianity, and who form politically and socially the Filipino people, are composed of the following tribes—the Lagados, the Visayans, the Ilocanos, the Bicors, the Pangasinanes, the Pangangans and the Cagayanes

THE HINGUIANS

THE people known as Tingmans live in the ringed mountains of north western Luzon. For the most part the western slopes of the central mountain chain are bare of forests, but both river valleys and mountain sides are carpeted with rank cogon grass. These people have been the subject of especial study by Mr. Fay Cooper Cole, of the Field Muscum, Chicago, to whose notes the writer is largely midebted.

The rough nature of the country, together with the lack of forest products and animals, has compelled the people to resort to intensive agriculture in order to make provision for the dry season. When a new field is to be prepared, they go to the mountain-side, build a stone wall, behind, which they cut away and fill in the soil until they have made a step or terrace. At the back of this plot they have another wall and again fill in until at last their fields rise step above step far up the mountain sides. Trigation is provided by diverting a mountain stream into the highest terrace and allowing the water to fall from terrace to terrace until it is completely used up.—Sometimes large dains are constructed and the water carried a great distance by aqueducts.—The terraces are generally built along a mountain stream, so that the most necessary pair of cultivation may be easily effected.

The custom of head-hunting has compelled the people of a district to gather into compact villages, which, while at peace with near neighbours, are at war with all others. In this way there have been built up compact agricultural settlements, each of which is ruled by an objaichy of old men who own allegiance to no tribal cluef

Until recent years due necessity has made of each man a warrior, while the desire for heads has caused the younger men to make frequent forays against hostile settlements

LINGUIANS PREPARING A SACRIFICE

After the medium has called the attention of the spirits to the sacrifice which is about to be offered to them a short time is allowed to clapse to enable them to partake of the repost. The animals are then singed and prepared for food

For the initial attack the warrior makes use of his spear, but when fighting at close quarters he depends entirely upon his shield, headaxe, and fighting-kinfe. The shield has three prongs at the top (see illustration on page 662), these he attempts to thrust between the legs of his adversary, then one blow of the headaxe places the enemy out of the conflict. The two prongs at the other end are used to ship about the neck, one more blow and the victor serzes his trophy and starts for his home.

Following the return of a successful war-party, a great celebration attended with much singing, dancing, and drinking of sugar-cane spirit, is held. Dancing is among the Tuiguiaus, as among other uncivilized people, the chief amusement. The best exponents display a great deal of energy and a keen sense of rhythm. Among their musical instruments is the nose-flute, upon which a plaintive time is played by blowing gently with one nostril, the other nostril being blocked to increase the

A feast is the invariable accompaniment of an Hugao marriage, as it is of all events connected with their lib. A large amount of the Hugao's time is spent in obtaining animals and other requisites for these feasts, which have a religious character power (see illustration on page 663). At the conclusion of the war-dance, the captured heads are split up into small fragments and a piece is given to each guest, so that he may take it to his home, and thus be constantly reminded of the provess of the victor

The lower end of each cylinder, about four feet in length, is embedded in cray, and into it, near its lower end, is inscribed a tube of bamboo, which, lying horizontally on the ground, converges upon and joins with a similar tube of a second cylinder. The common tube formed by this junction in turn converges with the tube common to the other pan of cylinders and with it opens by a clay junction into a final common tube of clay, which leads to the base of the fire. The piston consists of a stort stick,

When the piston is thrust downwards it drives the air before it to the finnace, as it is drawn upwards, the feathers, collapsing, allow the entrance of air from above. Heavy stone haminers and anvils are used to rough out the implements. The finishing is done with small metal hammers, and when the instrument is complete it is tempered by repeated heating, followed by plunging into cold water tame of their smiths has spread to all the neighbouring tribes, and their spears and headaxes have a wide distribution over Northern Luzon and in other parts of the archipelago

The women of the tribe wear short cotton skirts, which reach from the waist to the knees, and, when not at work dons! at sleeved packets. Then han is held in place with strands of beads, while similar ornaments surround their neeks, but the most prized decoration are the arm beads (see illustration on page 650). These are placed strand above strand, so that they reach from the wrist to the elbow, and if the wealth of the owner permits, even extend to the shoulder. Those above the wrists are do with so tightly that they cause those members to swell, but this is style, so they endure the memorial eneme without complaint.

Any attempt to a scribe the life of the Linguian must be preceed by at least an outline of his religion, for to him it is very real, and influences every act or his daily life believes in a great host of spirits, with whom he talks through the aid of mediums ceremomes the bodies of these mediums are possessed by the spirits of superior beings, and then, no longer as humans but as the spirits themselves, they direct what shall be done to bring health and happiness to the people of the village. Before such a ceremony the medium goes to a grove near the village and there makes an offering at the altar to the pinaing (see illustration on page 658). These are pecuharly shaped stones, which are beheved to be the abodes of the spirits who guard the village The heads of the stones are oiled, bark bands are field about their necks, and then the blood of a sacrificed pig mixed with rice is scattered before them

Before an annual is killed it is placed on the ground, betel nut and lime is laid on it, and then the medium strokes it with oiled hugers, meanwhile bidding the spirits to give attention to the offering which is about to be made. (See illustration on page 653)

After the spirits have been allowed sufficient time to partake of the repast, the animals are singed and prepared for food—(See illustration on page 654)

In the island of Palawan the pygnies make fire by placing a strip of rattan between a piece of bark-cloth and a split stick It is then drawn rapidly up and down until the cloth is ignited.

During these ceremonies spirit-houses are built, and in and about them offerings are made and dances are held. So strong is the faith of the people in the power and interest of the spirit-world that every event of daily life is attended with some manifestations of this behef. Tmy houses are erected in the fields and gardens (see illustration on page 665), ceremonies are held before the new rice can be placed in the granaues, while offerings are made in the houses at times of crisis and epidemics. (See illustration on page 670.)

Marriages are contracted for very young children and a pince is then paid for the girl. However, the children do not live together until near the age of puberty. When the time arrives for the final ceremony the groom carries a valuable jai to his parents-in-law, and from that time on he cannot call either of them by name. The girl's parents prepare a dish of fice and a coconut-shell of water, and place them on the floor between the couple (see illustration on page 650). The girl takes a handful of rice, squeezes it into a ball and drops it between the cracks in the bamboo floor, as an offering to the spirits. The boy likewise squeezes rice into a ball and tosses it into the air. If it breaks or rolls it is considered a sign that the couple may be unfaithful or their children die, but if it remains intact where it has fallen all is favourable. The couple drink of the cold water in the cup and the ceremony proper is complete.

A funeral is a great event in a Tinguian village. The dead man is dressed in his best garments and is placed in a sitting position against the wall of the room (see illustration on page 676). Above and about him are blankets and other valuable presents, the ghost-souls of which go with the soul of the dead person to his ancestors in Maglawa—his future home. The funeral generally lasts three days, and during that time the spouse of the deceased is kept under a white blanket, and both she

Besides the feast in celebration of victors, the Hugaos meke a sireat occasion of the loss of a head. The funeral of a beheaded body is attended by a vast number of people, and vengeance ceremonics are field on the succeeding days.

and the corpse are guarded might and day by the wailers. This is necessary, for otherwise evilly-disposed spirits would be sure to mime the body or cause the death of the living

During the period in which the body remains in the house friends and relatives continue to gather, and by the morning of the third day a considerable number have assembled. At some time during the morning of that day each male guest is beaten—one hundred and lifty strokes each. "Im order that all may feel as sorry as the family of the dead man." (See illustration on page 674.)

Toward nightfall an old woman sits down in front of the body, and covering her face with her hands begins to wail, begging the spirit of the dead man to enter her body. Suddenly she is possessed, and falls back in a faint. For a moment she is left in this condition, then fire and water are brought, the spirit is frightened away, and the medium gives the last messages of the deceased to his family.

The body is then buried beneath the house in a grave already occupied by one or more of his ancestors, but for many days the family is under strict taboo, and the grave is constantly guarded to prevent the approach of hostile spirits.

THE IGOROTS

The Igorots live also in Northern Luzon, and may be roughly classified as Bontoc Igorots, Lepanto Igorots and Benguet Igorots, but the name Igorot has been loosely used to include all the head-hunting peoples of Luzon, and later became almost synonymous with wild, it will here be used in its stricter sense.

The Igorots are a hardy and industrious race of fine physique, and are in colour a dark bronze. They have straight black hair, which is cut in a fringe over the forehead.

In the centre of each village, which usually contains a population of three or four thousand, is the tribunal (see illustration on page 652), where the headman and elders meet to settle disputes and order the affairs of the community

Tattooing is very fashionable, the pattern most common being an arrangement of straight and curved lines, but more ambitious designs are sometimes attempted. Both sexes are fond of personal adornment.

The standard of anorality amongst all sections of the Igorots is very high, and the numerried girls of each village sleep in a special "dormitory" (see illustration on page 664).—The vonths also sleep apart from their families, and these arrangements for the segociation of the sexes are zealously main tained by public opinion—Before marriage the boy and gormoust obtain the consent of their parents, and they make a trial of married life before the actual cremony takes place, with feasing and dances I was are considered unlineky, but if a neighbour can be found to adopt one of the children no ill results are feared from the mishap

The ignores believe in a supreme god and certain interior derioes, who bild communication with them through the ancestral spirits. It is the latter who are the near venerated by the Ignores, and who are the recipients of the greater part of the sacrifices which are frequently offered up. These spirits are represented by roughly carved pieces of wood. Near every village is a sacred tree, in which the ancestral souries are supposed to live, and rice and other food is put outside the house on little benches for them.

THE SUBANUNS

The Subanums are a large tribe, inhabiting the western pennisula of Mindanao, except the coast. The name Subanum (River dwellers) indicates this, being given to the people because they were met.

An Ifugao of distinction has by his house, as may be seen in the illustration, a roughly-carved resting bench indicative with in going up the rivers from the coast, in distinction to the Moros and other tribes, who are coast-dwellers. An admirable account of their customs has been written by Mr. E. B. Christie and published by the Bureau of Science at Manila.

The men wear their hair long and dress in a tight jacket and trousers. The women are fond of ornaments, of which earnings bangles, necklaces and bamboo combs are the most common

It is rare for a Subanun child to be born within a dwelling-house, as a short time before the birth is expected a small hut, in which charms are hung, is built apart for the mother. The reason for this is probably on account of their fear that the woman might die in childbirth in the dwelling-house Previously both parents subject themselves to a number of restrictions in diet and occupation. The husband may not behave otherwise than in a perfectly quiet and subdued manner, perhaps for fear of attracting the a tention of the spirits to the event that is to take place. He may not tie up the rafters of his house, or any other things, for fear of causing similar corapheations at the birth of his child, nor may be wear anything round his neck The mother, whose usual dress is a sarong, or petticoat, and a handkerchief field round the neck, covering the breasts and tucked in at the waist to the sarong, is also subject to these restrictions

At bith the mother is well cared for, and has the attention of a professional wise woman. Afterwards, however, she has to be for many days subjected to the heat of a great fire. This extremely painful ordeal has probably some relation to a supposed medical benefit to be obtained from a drying process. Often large burns are the result.

Both boys and guls go naked for several years after birth, wearing ornaments as charms against evil spirits during this period. Children are not given names till four or five years old. The family sleeps in one hut, there being no dormitories for boys and girls, as are found among some other peoples of these islands.

There are no remarkable or original customs connected with marriage, which is arranged by the parents of the bride and bridegroom, on proper settlements being made. The sexes, however, have plenty of opportunity of meeting at the great dancing feasts. No priest is necessary to solemnize the contract, but one is often present to invoke the blessing of the spirits. The essential feature is the symbolical act of the couple feeding each other out of a common rice-dish. The parents-in-law are treated with great respect and the husband does not address his wife's father and mother by their names, and the wife shows the same courtesy towards her husband's parents. Polygamy is permitted, but, as in other places, is a luxury which only the wealthy can afford.

Curiously enough, the Subanun men and women differ very little in personal appearance. Nor do they have either to any marked extent the subtly-varied character and outlook which form elsewhere such a large part of sexual attraction. A man is therefore more impelled to marriage by the need of female companionship, the instinct which urges him to secure a fresh lease of hie in the lives of his children and the want of someone to do for him those tasks which are best performed by women, than by more poetical reasons. Consequently he is not the victim of acute emotional distress if his suit is rejected. This commonsense basis of marriage, however, is doubtless a factor which explains its permaience and stability. Having entered upon the union with such views, the husband is unlikely to be unfaithful, and though his married life may be devoid of subtlety and charm, it has a security which is sound and orderly. This security is increased by the knowledge, that the party who seeks to disturb the marriage will have to pay compensation, or lose part of the settlement made upon it.

The Subanuns worship many spirits, amongst others the Spirits of the Sea, the Earth, the Woods, the Rivers and the Protector of the Sick.—Their religion rests on a series of alleged revelations made from time to time to the medicine-men or shamans.

The chief of these are greatly honoured and act principally in four ways: as oracles for the spirits to speak through them, as mediums, when they speak to the spirits and receive an audible reply, as priests, to offer sacrifices and make prayers, and as doctors, to cure illness. At their death they are not buried, but are laid in shelters, as it is supposed they return again to earth

Rude altars are raised to the spirits, on which are placed rice, chickens, eggs, betcl, 'obacco, and jars of rice beer. Small boats containing offerings are also set adult, perhaps with the idea of conveying away evil influences. Omens of various degrees are accepted, some being of sufficient importance to cancel an engagement or stop a journey, while others only have the power of deferring the operations to which they relate.

The Subanuus practise many arts of intercession and proportion, which fall chiefly under the heads of ceremomes to further agriculture, to obtain good hunting and to guard against ill-luck in house-building

They frequently hold feasts, and at all erect a platform upon which dancing takes place. The host, who has for some time collected provisions for the occasion, sends out invitations to the neighbouring chiefs who acquaint their followers with the news. The invitations are pieces of rattan, the number of knots in which denote the number of days before the feast is to be held. Each guest daily cuts off a knot from his piece of rattan, and when one knot only remains, he knows that the appointed time is at hand.

When the guests assemble, all weapons are laid aside and two or three men are deputed to stand watch over them. Generally some men abstain from the feast, to act as unofficial guardians of the peace, being reheved from time to time by others.

The Kalingas are a group of the tribes known as Igorots, who are all mountain agriculturists and until lately have been head-hunters.

 Before the feast begins, some friend of the host calls attention to the fines to be paid by anyone who does not observe the necessary decorum.

At those feasts which are held in fulfilment of a vow, conditional on the recovery of a sick person, or in memory of the dead, or for some other devotional object, altars are set up and ceremonies performed by the medicine men. These, however, do not have much effect on the guests, who consider that that side of the entertainment is the medicine-man's affair and do not let their own gaiety be affected by it. The medicine-men, indeed, though highly reverenced for their spiritual attainments and accomplishments, do not command much respect in the ordinary affairs of life, being thought to be unpractical and in some measure vitiated for practical questions by the defects of their qualities

Reference has been made above to the method of disposing of the bodies of deceased medicine-men, the ordinary individual is placed in a coffin or wrapped in a mat and buried in the ground. Great care is taken that earth shall not touch the coffin. After the funeral, the relations bathe in a river before returning to their homes.

THE MOROS

Thi Moros, originally inhabitants of the northern coast of Borneo, where they are known as Bajaus or Sea-gipsics, are Minhammadans of a mixed Malayan strain, with a considerable amount of Arab blood. These people invaded the Archipelago under description shortly before its discovery by the Spaniards and occupied the Sulu Islands, in which they are principally found under the names Bajaus and Hanuns, and then priatical expeditions in the early part of the last century were a constant source of terror to the inhabitants of the neighbouring islands.

They are short in stature (about five feet, four inches), muscular, slight and active, with small faces, low forcheads and bright eyes

Their attitude towards their chiefs and religion does not appear to be very clearly defined, and is perhaps regulated more by chance and circumstance than by any system et order and thought.

The Sultan of Sulu is nonmally ruler of all the Moros, but in oatlying islands his authority is not always recognized by those who are supposed to hold under him subordinate positions of trust.

In each village there is a data or pangiran by whom the social direction of the people is undertaken,

Their spiritual welfare is in the hands of priests, who are, in turn, subject to higher dignitaries (seri/s), Arabs, but the religion of the Moro is not strongly developed and is most in evidence when,

They are trained to aims from their earliest years and inherit a contempt for work, which induces them to prisme with vigour their chief occupation other than that of fishing, namely, that of raiding their neighboris, whose goods and women supply their requirements and comforts.

In this pursuit they are fearless, sometimes critel and unitning, though now their opportunities are few and then activities wisely and firmly controlled

The men dress in shirts. tackets and trousers, bright colonied sash and head-cloth or kerclife, or a turban which indicates that the wearer has been on a pilgimiage to Mecca Their garments are generally elaborately embroidered and often arc of the richest silks But their chief care is for their weapons, which are the barong, a heavy, short chopper with a razor edge and thick back, the kris, the kampilan, a twohandled sword, and a lance. These arms are of the finest quality and are sometimes beautifully decorated with carving and inlaid with silver

A race of sea robbers, the Moros, as might be expected, prefer to dwell on the coasts, building their houses on piles, from distaste of life or in pursuance of a vow, he runs amok and "kills as many here ics as he can before his own life pays the penalty of his enthusiasm."

Then mosques are ill-kept, then fasts irregularly observed, and the abstinences enjoined by their religion neglected if exasion seems likely to escape notice

The Moro man does not appear to find much amuscinent in dancing, though a lend of dance (mincha) is performed by young men armed with a sword or stick—it—s in the nature of a combat, and as a display of feneng is remarkable for the dexterity and quickness of movement shown. The women, however, invariably dance at marriages and other occusions of importance, postning with movements of the arms, wrists and hands—Most of the movement is above the waist, and the feet are hardly used at all obedient to his rule. Besides the datus, who judge the people and see that offenders against the laws are punished, the priestesses have some power. They are generally women of middle life skilled in weaving, who have been called by the sprits to become "Mahahan."

A priestess conducts the ceremones which are almost perpetually held to gratify the spirits, and makes offerings to them; she is also versed in medicine and attends to the sick. A distinctive diess denotes the honoin in which she is held, and any attempt by an unauthorized person to assume these honoins is punished by the spirits.

After a birth the priestess ribs the eyes of the infant and of the spectators with a particular kind of earth to prevent them from being blinded, and for her services receives a pecuniary reward. Severe sickness is cured by appealing to unseen beings, and those spirits which are evilly disposed are frequently appeased by the crection of a small shrine on which offerings are placed.

Marriage among the Bagobos takes place at a much later age than elsewhere in the Philippines, the contracting parties being sometimes as much as twenty years of age. The match is usually arranged by the parents, and formally ratified at a meeting of relatives and friends at which two headmen, or datus, represent the persons most interested. The father of the guil always makes a return present equal to about half of the marriage gift, so that any tainf that he has sold his daughter may be avoided.

Marriage does not take place immediately after this ecremony, but is delayed for a year, during which time the boy works for his future father-in law. The ceremony is as elsewhere a form of mutual feeding, the bride and bridegroom helping each other to rice out of a common dish. But a priestess first makes offerings to the spirits. The couple their go to then new home, but the bridegroom will have to do certain services for his wife's family for some years afterwards.

The houses are generally of one room, taised from the ground and reached by a ladder or a notched pole. Within the house is a platform, which forms the sleeping compartment of the room. The datus, however, have houses of a larger size, in which two hundred people or so can gather, as they do on festivals or in time of danger. The chief's house is built on the same plan as the others, the warriors occupying the sleeping bench, the wives and daughters having little boxes round the sides and the rest sleeping on the floor.

The walls are covered with spear, shields, loones and instruments of music, and in the room are various devices for the spirits to live in and so be com-, present to favour the occupations of the people and bring them happiness. The spirits are many in number and have in ler their patronage particular people. La instance, one spirit looks after the warners mother the weavers, another the brass workers and so on. The spirit who ewns all articles of food and who looks after the fields and crops has a shine built to him in the middle of any rice field, and after the crop is harvested a great ecremony is held in his honour. One spirit, however, is considered the chief the spirit who created the world, and no ecremony is performed without first making an offering to him The lesser spirits, too, are supposed to be his servants

A curious belief is that held in connection with the guardian spirits, one of whom is thought to be attached to each family. When children of two families marry, then guardian spirits inerge into one and become a single spirit guarding the pan

The spirits who watch over the warriors are particularly powerful and may only be addressed by warriors who have killed one or more persons. Such warriors, amongst whom may be counted a man who has killed the admirer of an unfaithful wife, can wear a particular dress, and those who have killed several persons in war add a further decoration to their dress.

Occasionally a human sacrifice is offered to the spirits who guard the warriors, and any person who has been troubled by ill-linck during the year, or any family in which there has been a death, may take part in it by making a payment to the datu who provides the sacrifice

The person sacrificed is, of course, a captive or a useless slave; slavery being a recognized institution and the need of slaves the chief incentive to raid against the neighboring tribes

The slave is placed with his back to a tree and his hands are field high above his head. A prayer is then offered up for prosperity. A fer this a spear with a very long shaft is placed pointing to the left breast of the victim, and all those who have assisted in the purchase take part in the sacrifice by holding or touching the shaft. At a given signa, the spear is thrust through the heart of the victim, whose corpse is later pierced with a number of wounds and then birried. Shortly afterwards a ceremony is field at which two festioned poles are raised on high to mark the occasion, the warnors drink deeply and boast of the warlike nature of their achievements and recount the engagements with the enemy which have earned them their proud position.

Other ceremonies are held by people of various occupations in honom of the spirits who are their particular guardians. When a Bagobo is ill he is moved from his own house to another's, in order that he may get the benefit of the good spirits there and perhaps be lost sight of by the exilt ones. Should he, however, be likely to die he is taken back to his own house, lest his death might bring on his friend's house the attention of the evil spirits. There is a class of spirits who are thought to cat the shades of dead people and to have power to impute the living—sometimes they are identified with the spirits of the dead. If a man dies in another's house his family has to pay compensation for the ill-linck his death is sure to bring.

CHAPTER XXVI

THE DUTCH EAST INDIES. By A CABATON

FIL Dutch East Indies, a colony of the kingdom of Holland, are situated in Asia, being bounded on the east by the Pacific Ocean, on the north by the China Sea, and on the south and west by the Indian Ocean. So great is the ethnographical variety in them that we must be content with a classification into three large groups, namely, the Papuaus, the Indonesians, and the Malays—the two latter being very superior both in numbers and in civilization to the first-named.

The woolly-haned Papuans, described in Chapter I, dwell chiefly in New Guinea, and, crossed with other blood, in some of the neighbouring islands. As Indonesians (that is to say, as Malays of almost pure descent) are reckoned the Bataks of Simatra, the Dyaks of Borneo, described in Chapter V, the Alfinas of Celebes and the Moluccas. The Malays, mixed with Hindu, Chinese and Arab elements, include the Malays proper, the Javanese, the Sindanese, the Madurans, and the Balinese

It would be impossible in a brief space to give an idea of the manners and customs of all the peoples of Indonesia, but those of the main divisions, the Javanese, Balmese, Malays, Bugis, Alfuras, Dyaks and Papuans are to a large extent those of all the other groups.

The Javanese, with whom we must join the Sundanese dwelling in Western Java and the Madurans of the island of Madura, make up a group of nearly thirty millions, and are the most cultivated and refined, as well as the most sociable, race in Indonesia.

The religion of the Javanese, the Sundanese, and the Madmans is Muhammadanism—of a sincere type, but functured with sinvivals and practices of older cults—The Javanese, no doubt originally animists like the mass of the still half-civilized Indonesians, were subsequently Hindinzed—Siva worship first and then Biddhism had very powerful influence over them, and r is to the Hindin civilization that are due to magnificent temples now in runns over Java—Boro-Buder, Prambanan and Mendut, to mention only the most famous

Islam probably reached Java towards the thirteenth century, spreading thence through all the islands of the Indian Archipelago. If a certain number of shese islands still remain pagan, if thirstianity is making progress among the Bataks of Sumerra and at Minahassa in Celebes, everywhere else Islam is already in possession or is gaining ground.

The Muhammadainsin of the Javane - is as mild and tolerant as it is sincere. The ritualistic ordinances of the Koran, with the exception of initiation, are but lightly regarded, and the same is true of the last of Ramadai. Belief is given to spirit, and to incarnate in in natural objects, such as stones or animals. There is nothing of Islam in the sacrifican feasts.

Family life is very strongly rooted in 1% a. The people are very prolific and rejoice over the birth of every child. As we are treated with much kindness, sons and daughters with extreme tenderness. The father in return, receives the greatest deterence and is never allowed to want for rice in his old age.

When the fact that a Jayonese woman is expecting to become a mother is announced to the relatives and friends, they offer her presents of rice dived yellow with turmeric, scented oils and candles, among the poerci classe. In the higher ranks there are added clothes, gold and silver

When a Javanese dies, the imams come to recite some surals of the Koran and to wash the body. Nowadays it is becoming more and more common for the near relatives to bathe and diess the corpse. They then wind it in a shroud, which goes seven or eight times round the body and envelops the head as well. At the end of twenty-four hours it is carried to the tomb on a bamboo litter, fitted with a parasol to protect it from the sim and the rain. Priests walk in front reciting the profession of the faith, and after come the relatives and friends.

The burial-rites are those of Islam. As a rule, the corpse is wrapped only in a winding-sheet and placed in a rache excavated laterally in the grave and shored up with planks, before the grave is filled in.

The Javanese believe in good and evil spirit are terrified at ghosts, and coopt astrology, lineky and unlineky days, omens, and d! the familian practices of magic

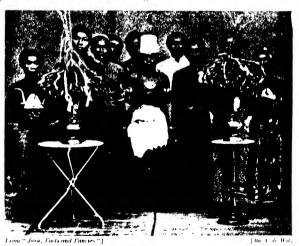

At the meeting of the bride and bridegroom they throw small bags containing chall, and but nuts at each other

Then medicine until recently has been entirely empirical and akm to magic. It has been in the hands of the dukuns, a kind of sorcerer, male or female, who exorcize exil spirits, torture patients and pour into them the pinces of plants and roots prepared by themselves. For some fifteen years, however, natives trained in European medicine have been invading the held of action of the dukuns.

The Javanese adore music and theatricals. Then elaborate music strikes one, when accustomed to it, as shull, somewhat melancholy, timeful and picturesque. A complete Javanese orchestra is called a gamelan. It comprises some full-sounding bamboo pipes, a series of goings struck with rods, viols, violins, guitars, drims, sylophones, etc.

No feast or grand ceremony occurs in Java without the aid of a gamelan and a performance of the acayang or shadow-play. The manuouettes for the latter are figures out out in buffalo-linde, painted and gift, which are manipulated behind a screen upon which the flame of a lamp casts then shadows. An actor, who is called the dalang, sets forth the play, always taken from the Ramayana or Mahabharata, to the action of the marionettes. The male portion of the audience watches the marionettes themselves, the women, on the further side of the screen, see only the projected shadows.

The Javanese are also very fond of the performances of the ronggengs, public dancers, whose "dancing" consists of a series of plastic poses and living pictures.

Animal combats, tiger against buffalo, bull against bull, fights between two cocks, quails, crickets, or fish, games of chess, draughts, and cards are also very popular in Java.

The Balmese, who inhabit the small, fertile volcanic island of Bah, to the east of Java, are physically like the Javanese, but are very different in their customs, owing to their persistent Hinduism.

The layantse are most assiduous in making offerings of food, not only at birth, marriage and death, and at ceremonics concerned with the prosperity of agriculture, but at almost any incident of daily life.

This small group typifies the unconquerable resistance of Hinduism against Muhammadan persecution. It has preserved through the centuries the Sivaism elsewhere in Indonesia entirely crushed out. Siva and his consort Duiga, and a certain Devi Sèri—the Hindu Sri—are the only real divinities, though the other members of the Hindu pantheon are also admitted into the painted and richly-gilt temples. Agraman rites have a large place in the religion of the Bahnese, but they have retained the prayers, the purifying fasts, the cremation of the dead, the absolute aversion from the flesh of cattle and buffaloes, the respect for the "five products" of the cow, and the oppressive system of caste, which mark Hinduism.

There is a curious survival of the ancient Polynesian gods among the Balinese, who pay reverence to quaint little figures made out of kepcgs or Chimese cash, which they dress up in rich stuffs and call Rabut Sedana.

NATIVES OF THE TENINBRE ISLANDS

The lenumber Islands of which ite best known is Irmor Laur are studied midway between Jimor and New Guinea. The natives resembling Malvis rather than Fapuans are head bunters and are constantly enested in tribal warfare. They live by hunting fabrics and as iculture but have some Inowledge of working iron and copper. In religion they are animists. Their houses are built on piles and are generally found on the hills near the coast.

The Javanese are very lond of the performances of street dancers whose entertainments consist of a series of plastic poses and living pictures

The birth customs are the same in Bah as in Java, with the omission of the Musuhinan observances. It is at the third and seventh month before child birth that offerings are made to the gods to obtain protection against evil spirits.

The parents arrange the mairrages, and only among children of the same caste. The usual marriage is called mepadik, that is to say, purchase of the bride. The price is between two and ten poinds among people of moderate means, fifty poinds among the rich. The suitor has almost always to live and work for a long time with the gul's parents in order to earn the mepadik. Merang kat, or marriage by capture, with the consent of the bride, tends more and more to replace this. When it takes the form of actual violent carrying-off of the girl, against the family's wishes, it is called melegandang. The man who has recourse to it is obliged to live in liiding with his victim until the parents shall have given their consent and have received from him the purchase-price. If they persist in their refusal, he makes application to the prince, who fixes the price. The union is illegiturate without either the consent of the parents or the intervention of the prince.

A Brahman can marry a wife from each of the four castes, a man of the people can have but one A widow of high caste may not remain mider the severest and most dishonouring penalties. The lot of a Balmese woman is very poor Profoundly despised when she is childless or has only daughters, she can only improve her position by bearing sons, the absence of whom is supposed to be a prinishment due to taults which she had committed. Even the wives of a prince are not exempt. The difficulty is often surmounted by the adoption of a strange boy or a brother's son

WAYANG DANCERS

The wayang, a shadow-play performed by manonettes, is the most performed entertainment in Java and is performed on every important occasion. Symbolical dances are sixth in the pages of the drama-

The cremation of the dead and the custom of casting the ashes into the sea are characteristic Hindu survivals in Bali. But with a sing children, and in event of an epid anc, such as smallpox, for instance, cremation is not adopted. There is no specified time for cremation, and as it necessitates vast expense, the corpse sometimes remains five or ten years before being binned. In the latter case, all trace of the body having disappeared, there is burned in its stead a maninkin made of palm-leaves , and this is what is done also for those who die away from the island.

Previous to cremation the body is placed under a special shelter ejected on the family property

After the accomplishment of all the religious and domestic formalities, the corpse is burned in a pyramid-shaped construction of bamboo and rattan, which is called a sema

The wives offer food every day to the course of their husband kiss it, and bathe it with their tears until the date of the cremation. The decomposition of the body is delayed by fumigation with benzom

This monring lasts until the eye of the funeral. The hight before is spent in rejoicing and incessant dancing around the destined victims. They are offered the most dainty dishes and made to drink a quantity of strong liquor, while the priests depict to them the delights which awart them in the next life. On the day itself each one is carried to the pyre in a bamboo palanquin decorated with flowers, nice eded by offerines to the

The wives of a prince and princesses of the blood used not to allow anyone to dare lay hands on them to stab them, which would have defiled them, and therefore used themselves to spring into the flames lighted to consume them. The cremation of widows (which only took place indeed in royal or princely families) has almost entirely disappeared in Bah, under the pressure of the Dutch government

The island of Simiatra, much vaster but less thickly populated than that of Java, is situated to the westward of it and south of the Malay Pennisula. The three most important racial groups in Sumatra are the Malays proper, the Achinese, and the Bataks.

Of the Malays, a description has aheady been given in Chapter IX, but it is to be noted that among the Malays of Minangkaban (the upper part of the modern Padang), the ancient matriarchal organization of the family has bequeathed to woman an important position, mairiage for her is a matter of mutual choice, and her husband comes to live with her parents. The Achinese, to the number of minety thousand, inhabit the northern extremity of Sumatra Then kingdom, which once dominated the whole island, had dealings with China, Japan, Egypt, Turkey, Persia, and all European nations that came to Indonesia. In the eighteenth century it declined, but it is not even yet completely conquered by the Dutch. Warlike, treacherous, haughty and fanatical, the Achinese hate strangers, and indulge in robbery and brigandage. They are intemperate, using both opium and strong drink to excess

The Achinese, indeed, are strong, rather fanatical Musulmans On all the important occasions in their lives, at birth, at death, on departure for a long journey, in severe illness, when much business is at stake, they give a konduri, a religious repast, to which are invited some of the poor and at which there are recitations from the Koran and prayers. The most important of these konduris, the konduri mulud, in honour of Muhammad, is held in every village without exception.

The funeral 11tes are the same as among the Malays and the Javanese.

This is also true of games and aniusements. At Ramada'i there are grand processions and religious festivities.

The Bataks are Malays in an inferior stage of civilization, who are confined to the residency of Tapanuh, south of Achin. At one time they had a terrible reputation, they were accused of eating their aged parents when they became incapable of looking after themselves, so as to give them pions burial in their own stomachs. At the season of the maturity of the orange the old man, forced to become part of the festival, himself climbed up a tree. The family, down below, chanted in refrain

"When the finit is ripe, it falls from the tree!"
Finally the victim let himself fall to the ground, where he was slain and pionsly consumed. Such atrocties (which were, bowever, entirely ritial in character) do not appear to continue nowadays.

Though beginning to become Muhammadans of Christians, they are largely pagan, with traces of Hindman. They distinguish between three classes of debatas or gods-those of heaven, those of earth, and those of the lower regions. The most respected, Balara Guru, has often been identified with Sixa.

Some of them have a notion of a sovereign being, the origin of all that exists—by hame Hast-Hast—Spirits, especially the soils of the dead, haunt—the mountains, rocks, woods and villages. Rice, fruit and flowers are offered to these. The Bataks have neither tem-

The most daugerous charm is composed of various portions of the body, especially the head, of a man killed in battle, or of a voing orphan craftily murdered by the sorceter. A decoction made therefrom represents the soul of the dead, and a pupuk, or mainiskin, anomated with it renders its possessor invulnerable and attracts all good fortune to him.

CHAPTER XXVII

EGYPT, By H R HALL, M.A., FSA

The separate and distinct nationality of the modern Egyptians is often lost sight of by writers of the present day. One regards the Ancient Egyptians as a nation in every way distinct from its neighbours, but their modern descendants are very rarely treated as a people sin generis. One speaks of "Copts" and of "Fellahin" as if they were distinct races; one credits the Copts with an exclusive right to descent from the Ancient Egyptians, and one regards the "Fellahin" as "Arabs," as if they were exclusively descended from the Moslem conquerors of the country. The Egyptian Moslems are themselves very largely to blame for this error. The common religious bond of Islam, that artificially abolishes national distinctions among Moslems, has made the Muhammadan Egyptians feel themselves so akin to their Asiatic co-religionists that they call themselves. "Arabs," and have lost sight of their distinct Egyptian nationality and their common racial connexion with the Christian Copts. And the latter, having preserved their continuity with the past, regard themselves, and until quite lately have generally been regarded in Europe, as the sole descendants of the Ancient Egyptians. This is a complete mistake.

The great majority of the modern Egyptians, whether Muhammadan or Christian, are of the same Nilotic race as the Ancient Egyptians. And to anyone familiar with the ancient monuments this is evident enough. The figures, heads, features and colouring of the modern people, whether they call themselves "Copts" or "Arabs," are precisely the same as those of the Ancient Egyptians as they are represented on the monuments, and are absolutely un-Semitic and non-Arab in type. The great cleavage caused by the introduction and gradual spread of Islain, sometimes peaceable, sometimes forcible, has of course caused a good deal of difference between the customs of the two confessions. But this difference is not so great as might be expected, even in religious matters. Strange to say, the Moslem elder will pray to the Virgin and make offerings to Christian saints on occasion and in certain places. Moslems, of course officially venerate both Christian His mother, a fact of which Western Christians often are unaware. And in Egypt they pray to their own Moslem saints, such as the Sitt Zemab ("the lady Zemab") and many others, quite as in the smainty Christians do to their saints, though course they make no images of them. The Moslem peasant, too, preserves (1*) popular religion elements that are older than Islâm of Christianity, nay, older even than the official ancient paganisms, for all the fellablin venerate sacred trees, sticks and stones, the on them rags belonging to the sick, and even transport the sick to them in the hope of his curring himself by contemplation of the sacred fetish, assisted by mixed prayers to Sitt Zemab St. George, indicto Sitt Minam (the Virgin Mary), as well as God and His Prophet.

Despite phenomena of this kind, however, which testify to the real unity of the whole population, the feasts and fasts, etc. of the two religious of course differ radically

In the matter of diess the face-coars and Moslems are now able, as the traditional blue or black turban, imposed long ago on the Copts, is now wern only by about priests, and is their distinguishing mark, as the green tind in is of a Savvid, or reputed descendant of the Prophet. The Europeanized upper classes always were ordinary European diess, except for the Moslem fez or tarbush. The young man of the lower middle class in towns wears a European packet over the native costnine instead of the fine black silk gown which is worn by the rich fellahîn in the country. The native costnine consists of a pair of full drawers (libas), a soft shirt (kamîs), a short sleeveless waistcoat (sudêra), and a long vest of striped silk and cotton (ku/tan), open in front and reaching to the ankles, with long sleeves. This is usually confined by a silk or muslin girdle or kamarband (hexam). In writer full dress over all is the big cloak or 'abaya of cloth or silk. The fellah wears

Round this "maghrebi" tarbûsh the older men twist the tin ban, which is discarded by the younger generation.

All Egyptian men of the upper classes wear then han cut close to the bone, and the Moslem fellahîn usually shave the head, leaving only a longish lock on the top, which, they say, is for the angel to catch them by if they fall off the razor-like bridge al Suat on their way to Paradise Another explanation is that it is there for a heathen enemy to hold the head by in case its owner is killed in battle for Islâm, as otherwise he would carry off the head by putting his finger in its month, which would be utter defilement of the tongue which had praised Allah and recited the prayers of the Koran. This peculiar lock the bigger boys generally wear very long, in Upper Egypt they often braid it, but, as it is always coiled up under their dirty little linen caps or takiyas, it is never visible. One sees the poorest boys, who are too poor even to possess a cap, with it sticking out in a frowsy bush, sometimes loosely plaited. At about the age of fifteen or sixteen it is cut to the regulation man's length of three or four inches. To possess no headgear is the mark of the direct poverty, it corresponds to bare feet in England. The headgear is the sign of dignity, it must always be worn except in the most extreme privacy, and to stuke it off a man's head is to offer him the greatest insult and violence possible Here we see the Mahmal, or sacred litter (often confused with the Kreweh or Holy Carpet) being taken in procession through the Rumeleh Square at Cairo, with a military escort, between crowds of sightseers. The shikh of the pilgrimage used formerly, as part of the ceremony, to ride over the backs of devotees

The fellah bride rides with a girl friend on the bridal camel saddle. I the most fellah women, she does not trouble to wear a face-veil. The picture shows well the dress of the male fellahin.

In summer the fellahîn work practically naked, wearing only the libas and the lakiya, boys quite naked

The women wear the hair braided in an infinity of little plants with coms or "sequins," tied in with black silk. On the head is a kind of turban with an ornament of gold or gilt metal called a kins, over which is worn the black or white veil concealing the whole face except the eyes; between the eyes is a peculiar cylindrical ornament of gold or brass, with two ridges round it. This face-veil is not worn by the fellah-women, who content themselves with a head-veil with which they can cover their faces when necessary. The clothing (see illustration on page 699) consists of loose trousers or shintryan, a long vest (velek), a girdle, and a packet, with a long loose black silk gown or tob for going out in Earrings are worn by women, but not by Egyptian men, though most men have had their ears bored as boys by the harim-women, who often put rings in the small boys' cars. Big boys who consider themselves dandles often wear a single heavy earing of silver in one car. This is more common in Upper than in Lower Egypt, and in Nubia even the older men often wear a single ring. The finger-rings, commonly worn by all, are silver, and plain

We now pass to the distinctive customs of the country, from birth to death. The birth customs of the two religious are differentiated only by the Christian rite of baptism. On the morning after the birth of a boy, which is always greeted with far more enthusiasm, than that of a girl, wealthy fellah tambles send for dancers to perform in front of the house or in the court

Generally these are the ordinary dancing-girls, called Gháziyát, but when they can be obtained in towns the peculiar boy-dancers called Khewalin are employed, as being specially appropriate to the birth of a boy. These dancing-boys wear ordinary male costinue except that they keep the whole of their han long and plarted with coins, etc., in exactly the same fashion as girls. On the seventh day after the birth the child is exhibited to the mother's female friends in girls state, and after the child has been shaken in a sieve, it is solemnly carried about the harim in procession. The friends then give presents for the child and pray for its welfare. The mother is ceremonally impure for a certain period, usually forty days, and then goes to the bath.

The next great ceremony in the life of an Egyptian, which is Moslem or Critistian, is his initiation, which takes place at the age of six or seven years. He is always paraded about the village or town in tawdry state before the ceremov, and, whether to avert the evil eye or not, is diessed, with the exception of his fez or tarbush, as a girl, wearing the velek and carrings, and often with his top-lock carefully platted in the special woman's fashion, and hanging down.

There is little question of courtship in Egy₁). A marriage is arranged either by the mair's mother or by a professional go-between. The mair's practically seen nothing of his bride before, unless the couple are ordinary iclahs. Marriages are earlier than in Europe, but child-marriage is unknown. When the marriage is air inged, the eldest male relative of the bride enters inpont he scene, to arrange the dowry (mahr). When the arranged sum has been paid over, the marriage contract is signed.

The bridegroom entertains his friends every night The bride now makes a state visit to the public bath, walking under a canopy held by her male relatives, and escorted by women who raise shrill wavening ones, called saghárít, which are intended to express delight. Returned to her home for the last time, she entertains her friends and relatives and collects monetary contributions from them, passing round a lump of henna into which those invited stick coms. The guests are meanwhile entertained by a company of 'almehs or hired singers. This last evening at home is called the "henna-night" (lelet el-henna) On the next evening takes place zeffet el arûsch, the budal procession. In towns the bude either walks or rides a donkey beneath a canopy as before, but in the country the fellah-biide. especially if she belong to a rich family, rides a stately camel, with a gorgeous tent-like canopy over her head, usually supported on crossing palm-branches, the fronds of which wave above (see

After her ride musicians with kettledrums, also on camels, and she is accompanied by the whole village on foot. At the bridegroom's house she dismounts, and is often first conducted to a special tent put up outside it, where she sups with her female relatives. Meanwhile, the bridegroom goes to the mosque accompanied by torchbearers and musicians. On his return, he finds that the bride has taken possession of his house. He enters, and sees his wife alone and face-to-face for the first time. If he takes a dislike to her on the spot, he has his remedy. He has only to pronounce the formula of triple divorce, and is free. But he usually avoids doing this till a decent interval has elapsed. The Koran allows the most extreme freedom of divorce to a man. Four wives at most are permitted, but there is unlimited licence of concubinage. Since the prehibition of slavery, concubinage is less common, and many Moslems are content with a single wife. The Copts, of course, are monogamous. Their marriage ceremonics hardly differ from those of the Moslems, except that they have their Christian service in church. The priest blesses the bridal rings, and places a crown on the bride's head. Mass is celebrated, the Sacrament being administered to all present.

Of all Moslems, the Egyptians are the most tolerant and easy-going. The Hagg or pilgrimage to Mecca is not often undertaken by them. They do not always observe then fasts so strictly as the Copts do thems—the fellahin often are lax in keeping Ramadán, but then they have the perfectly valid excuse of their hard manual labour—The obligatory prayers are generally performed by all,

One of the great sports of the Eysptian peasants or fellahin is the game of quarter staff, which is being played here at a local feast

The performances of the true dervishes, as the dancers and whitlers at Carro are of the same kind. Many fellahîn, especially the sakkahs or water-carriers, belong to dervish orders. They we anothing to distinguish them from other fellahs, but the dervishes who hive together in "monasteries" at Carro wear a distinctive high white tarbush (see illustration on page 692). The higher orders of dervishes are often extremely intelligent, and have nothing to do with these ecistatic performances, though they do not disapprove of them—the Feklashiya are mixtus of an exalted type, akin to the Persian Sutix. They believe in the transmigration of souls, and are extremely unorthodox in all ways. The lower kinds of derivishes are outhodox enough, but quite ignorant,

The *Lielad Nuh, or "Noah's Boys," are a wend and wild sect, which used to be much in evidence at the great fan of Tanta in the Delta, held every year in honour of the local saint es-Sevyid el-Bedawi, or "Abu "I-Farrág," "The Shékh of the Arabs". This, and similar fairs, are really nothing at all but direct descendants of old Egyptian pagan festivals like that of Bubastis, described by Herodotus.

One of the most remarkable festivals of Egypt is that celebrated at Caro every year, when the Mahmal, or sacred litter, leaves the city to go to Mecca. The litter (which is not to be confused with the Kisweh, or Holy Carpet, which also goes to Mecca) was originally sent to Mecca with each yearly pilgrimage as an emblem of the royalty of Egypt—nobody ever rode or rides in it; it is purely a compliment to the Holy Place of Islâm—It is still taken in procession, borne on camelback, from the Rumêleh Square near the Citadel, and being a sort of emblem of the faithfulness of Egypt to Islâm, the procession (see illustration on page 695) always rouses the greatest enthusiasm among the populace, and enormous crowds gather to watch its departure and also its return. Actually the Mahmal is a pyramidal erection, righly worked with inscriptions and golden The camel bearing it is led and accompanied on foot by all the highest 'ûlama (clergy) of Cairo, and is escorted by police and soldiers, the Governor, his staff and a squad of cavalry riding before it, while behind it rides the Shêkh el-Gemel or Shêkh el-Hagg, the leader of the pilgriniage, on his camel. The ceremony of the Dôsch, or riding over the backs of devotees, by the Shekh el-Hagg, is no longer performed

The opening of the dams of the Khalis Canal to migate the fields was an occasion of much ceremony. As the procession of decorated boats passed along minute guns were fired and on the principal vessel an Arab band played continuously

A peculiar custom, probably also of ancient origin, was observed till late years at Cairo – the ceremony of "the cutting of the Khalig". The Khalig was a canal that ran through Cairo, it is now filled up and converted into a street. During the period of low Nile the river-entrance of this canal was closed by a dam, which on the rise of the Nile every year was solemnly broken through to admit the waters of the river -A small ship, with masts and vards gaily decorated with flags, and armed with small guns, was towed in procession to the canal-entrance with much tom-toniming and firing off of the guirs (see illustration on this page), and the ceremony of cutting the dam was performed with great festivity

At all festivities an invariable "event" is a contest of quarter-staff, or backsword-play (see illustration on page 701) The Egyptian is an adept in the use of the nabit, or heavy stick, which

CHAPTER XXVIII

THE SOUTHERN SUDAN, By C G SELIGMANN, M.D.

THE Nilotes are a series of independent tribes, occupying a vast area stretching from the neighbourhood of Renk in the north (scarcely three hundred indes south of Khartinn) to Uganda, and spreading east to west from the Abyssinian border nearly to the watershed dividing the affluents of the Nilo and the Congo. Physically they differ from the typical Central African Negro in their great stature (average height nearly five feet eleven inches) and lean build, and in the great leight of the head. From the cultural standpoint they somewhat resemble the Zulu, and it is certain that, like them, they have in their veins a considerable amount of the blood of those light-coloured early Hamitic invaders and civilizers of Africa of whom the Somah and Beja peoples of the Eastern Desert are probably the purest modern representatives. Thus, in spite of an extremely dark skin and a low level of skill in technical processes, it is not surprising that the Nilotes lack the repulsive behefs and bloody rites, that until recently found their most complete expression in the royal "customs" of the kingdoms of the West Coast. Nor, as far as is at present known, does fetishism play any considerable part in their behefs.

The Dinkas live in exhibitional huts built of mud and wattle, or sometimes of mud only and roofed with a grass or other veretable thatch. In the wet season settlements of the Dinkas these huts are usually built on piles.

Nakedness is the rule among the men of the Nilotic tribes, the women are generally clad in prepared goat or slicep skins, but among the Niies some at least of the younger women, perhaps only the unmarried, wear little beyond a string of beads. In this the Nilotes contrast with their shorter, lighter-coloured, but more savage neighbours (Nyam Nyau, etc.) of the Cougo affluents

Considering the persistence of geographers in the Nile quest, and the number of travellers of scientific training who have made journeys in their country, it is surprising how little is known about the beliefs, customs and ideas of these tribes, and it is for this reason that the following account will be limited mainly to the Shilluk and Dinka, the two least unknown tribes of this line care.)

All these tribes here in expanding a huts binds of mud and watthe or sometimes of mind only and roofed with a grass or other vegetable thatch. Sometimes these houses are both on piles, and this is especially the case in the wet season settlements of some of the Dinka.

The Dinka are by far the most numerous of the Nilotes, but no Dinka nation has argen, for the congeries of Gibes who cait Geniselves Jieng (whence the Arabic — Dinkawi," anglicized into "Dinka") have never recognized a supreme head, as do the Shillink , nor have they ever been united under a unlitary despot, as Chaka united the Zulin — Each community is largely autonomous rander the leadership of a cliret or headman, who, though primarily a occasion, and whose wish is law. Except among the marshland tribes who have no herds, cattle form the economic basis of Dinka society, they are the currency in which birde-prices and blood lines are paid, and the desire to acquire a neighbour's herds is the common cause of those inter-tribal raids which constitute Dinka warfare.

The facial characteristics of the Nilotes are well snown in the accompanying photographs. The ash-sineared, coarse featured, naked negroid, armed with a long spear and squatting behind an oblong hide shield (see illustration on page 710), is a fan sample of a Dinka vonth, though in this nation, as among the Shillik, a some what more refined type (see upper illustration on this page) is by no means uncommon

Not very much is known concerning the childhood and upbringing of the children of these tribes, but the Dinka boys early foreshadow the importance that cattle will be to them in their after-life by making grotesque clay models of their favourites. Initiation ceremonies seem to be absent, but all Dinka and Shillink have their lower front teeth removed. The only exception to this rule appears to be in the case of the Shillink princes, perhaps in order to accentuate the difference between them and commoners, and to avoid the levelling effect of the ceremony, since all the boys whose teeth are knocked out together are looked upon as life-long companions and form a definite ageclass, the members of which are bound to assist each other through life

The number of wives a Dinka possesses is regulated by the number of cattle he owns, for the price of a wife is about ten cows. Thus the rich old men possess most wives, and infidelity is common and, except as a means of obtaining more cows, marriage is little A girl remains in her mother's house during her betrothal and until the bride price is paid. When this has been done a bullock proyided by her father is killed, a dance takes place, and the bride is escorted in the evening to the house of the bridegroom's mother The budgeroom then kills a bullock and smears some of the contents of the large gut on the gnl's breasts and shoulders, and this seems to complete the marriage ceremony

Children are named without any formality, the name being chosen by the relatives of the grand-parents' generation, but if the parents desire any special name they mention it to the old folk, who will adopt the suggestion if they think fit. The first boy is generally called after his father's father and the first girl after the father's mother, subsequent children may be named after the cows paid as the bride-price. When a boy is of a martiageable age cattle are set aside for him to enable him to purchase himself a wife.

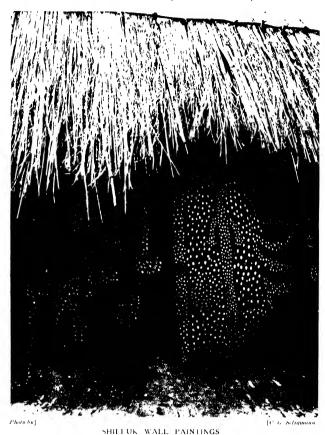

The Dinka are to temistic, i c, each tribe is divided into a number of clans, each speaking of a certain species of animal, or more rarely of plant, as their

"ancestor," meaning by this that the clan is derived from a mail born as one of twins, his fellow-twin being an animal of the species which is the totem of the clan. No man injures his totem animal, but all show regard for it in various ways. Although children take their father's totem, they also respect their mother's, and an animal may be avoided for several generations for this reason. Thus, a man whose paternal grandmother had a poisonous snake as totein, said that if he then the post was thrust into the hole and the earth thrown in and pressed down. The flesh of the goat was boiled and eaten, the bones were not broken, but were placed on the ground round the post and left there for a month, after which they were thrown into the river, with the exception of the skull and backbone, which were put upon the post. Pieces of meat were thrown in four directions, apparently towards the points of the compass, and meat was placed on the ground at

The bones, together with an iron bracelet, were thrown into the river, because the father of the ancestor who sent the sickness was twin with a certain fish. and these oftenings were in tended to appease him More commonly the ancestral spirits are worshipped without any reference to their animal forms

A stick or young sapling is generally stuck into the mound near the horns, and a cattle rope may be hung upon this (see illustration on page These shrines are usually made by the widow of a Dinka, while his sons will provide the bullock and set the horns in position. They are made to propitiate the spirit of the dead man and to provide limi with a resting-place.

The Dinka are a highly religious people and worship a god named Dengdit, meaning "Great Rain," and a host of ancestral spirits called jok. Dengdit is also called Nyahch, which means "in the above," and this name is often used in prayers—Nyalich ko kwar ("God and our ancestors"). Dengdit is greater than the jok; it is he who created the world and established the order of things, he sends the rain from the "rain-place," which

The rammakers hold a very important position among the Dinka, they are the true chiefs of the people, and each incarnates the spirit of a great rainmaking ancestor, so that all recognize the futility of competing with him Further, the knowledge that a powerful rammaker exists naturally leads those who dwell within his sphere of influence to leave all such matters in his hands. Thus he attams great power, and is consulted on all important questions, for the spirit of the great ancestor dwelling in him renders him far-seeing and wiser than common men. His authority is, however, not absolute, and an instance is on record of his having counselled the people not to enter into a certain fight, yet they fought and were defeated. The rammaker should not drink native beer, lest he should get angry and quarrel with the men of his village

One group of Dinka stated that they did not specially protect their rainmaker from violent death or from engaging in warfare, for it was certain that if he died the ancestral spirit would pass immediately to a suitable successor, but he would not be allowed to die of old age or from a lingering sickness, for this would affect the welfare of the tribe, and there would be a famine, the herds would diminish, and the people themselves suffer from disease. A rainmaker, feeling that he was getting old and infirm, would tell his people that it was time for him to die, and they would dig a big grave in which he would be down, while his friends and relations and his younger children grouped themselves around him. Here he would remain for many hours without food or drink, talking to the people concerning the past history of the tribe, his methods of government, and their behaviour in the future. When he had finished all he had to say they would cover him up with earth and thus suffocete One tribe said that they strangled then rammaker in his own house after having prepared a grave for him Then they would wash his body and kill a bullock in front of his house, and having removed the skin, use it to form a lining to the newly-made grave me which they lowered his body This tribe cudeavoin to preserve then rammaker from accidental death, for ency beheve that such an event would cause sickness to the tribe. It is probable that all tubes sprinkle a little nulk on the grave, and place some property

"Terpiu our ancestor, we have brought you a sacrifice, be pleased to cause rain to fall." The blood is collected in a goind and cooked and eaten by the old and important men of the clan. Some of the flesh is cooked with a great deal of far and left for some months near the sacred bush for the pok, and is ultimately eaten by people who possess no cattle of their own. The flesh of the other bullock is eaten at once, the bones are thrown away, but the horns are added to those already decorating the post.

The Shillink occupy a narrow fringe of land on the west bank of the Nile stretching from Kaka in the north to Lake No in the south. They also occupy the east bank, between Kodok, and

The king, his children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren comprise the aristocracy, royal descent not being recognized beyond four generations. Sacrifices are offered to Nyakang to induce him to prevail upon Tuok to send rain and other blessings Juok is formless and invisible, and like the air is everywhere at once. There appears also to be some vague belief that the spirits of the dead are every where, and that sometimes they come to their descendants in dreams and help them and give them good advice, but this behef does not seem to have given use to any considerable worship of the dead as it has done among the Dinka, although the whole religion of the Shillink consists of a cult of Nyakang the semi-divine hero ancestor

This cult has given rise to many shrines (see illustration on page 716). Nyakang himself possessing no less than ten, all of which are called grayes, though it is well known that nobody is buried in them. They do not differ in appearance from the shrines of other Shillink kings, which are time grayes, and ceremonies are performed at these graves or shrines which show the intimate relation, possibly even confusion, which exists between Nyakang and subsequent kings. From what has been said it is obvious that the Shilliuk king, like the Dinka rammakers, must be considered to belong to that class of ruler which Professor J. G. Frazer has styled "Divine Kings.". There is no doubt that they are, or were, killed with all ceremony when they began to show signs of ill-health or of old age, in order to prevent such disasters as the failure of the crops, general sickness among the people, or weakness and decay among the cattle and flocks, which were believed to be the meyitable consequences of such an event. It is also obvious that the spirit was supposed to pass from the slam kine into his successor, and had the kine been allowed to grow old and decrepit the ancestral spirit would also have suffer dailors of vigour, which would have been a national calamity

It is difficult to be quitsure of the method employed for killing the king, as different accounts were given in different localities, but it seems clear that the old meth of was to take the king to a socially prepared but, in which he lay down with his head resping on the thigh of a nubile virgin (according to some, one of his brother's daughters), and the entrance to the hut was then closed and the couple left to the of thirst and starvation. Some months later the hat was broken open and the bones, all that now remained, were wrapped in a slap and brined in a specially prepared grave. A new hut was built over the grave, and this became a shrine, a few hits being creeted around it within the enclosure for the use of the attendants.

and who was so distressed that he shouted to the people out side and commanded them on no account to leave his successor to die thus slowly

There are remains in tolk lore of an even earlier practice, dating back to the days when the king had to fight for his life with anyone of the blood royal who was bold enough to come against him. Such an attack would be delivered at night when the king was in the enclosure with his wives and without his bodyguard It is said that even now the king remains wake during the night and sleeps only by day when surrounded by his attendants This statement was certainly borne out by the usually sleepy condition of the king. It was also agreed that it was the king's wives who first complained of his increasing age or sentity, and desired his death

It seems that no public announcement of the king's death was made, but the news was allowed to spread gradually. During the interregnum which occurred the strongest cline's would

A bullock is killed, but only a select few partake of the flesh. The sacred object Nyakang is now carried back into the shrine, and the king-elect is lifted up and placed on the stool and remains seated here for some time, probably till siniset, when he is escorted to three new huts specially built for him. Apparently this choice was not supposed to be inspired, for the animal sacrificed, or the object called Nyakang which was kept in the shrine of Nyakang, night indicate that the wrong man had been appointed.

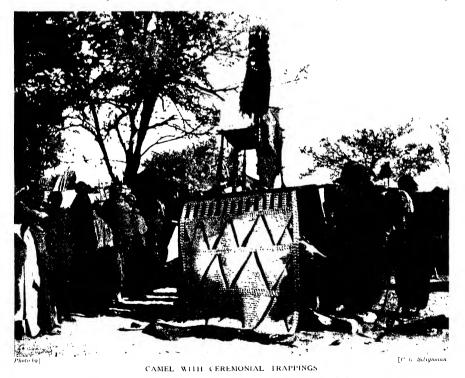

The new king is conducted to a village near Fashoda, the capital, while headmen go to the northern limits of the Shilluk kingdom and tell the priests of the shrine at Akuiwa village to bring with them the sacred four legged stool and the object called Nyakang, which is cylindrical in shape and two to three feet long This is probably an effigy of the hero. If Nyakang does not approve of the newlyselected king this object becomes so heavy that it cannot be removed from the shrine A sham fight takes place when these people incet the kingelect and his retinue, and the tormer are always successful, and after this they escort the king-elect to Fashoda, where the sacred object is carried into the shrine of Nyakang It is brought out presently

The southern part of Kordofan lying to the west of the White Nile and the north of the Bahiel-Ghazal consists of a flat plain dotted with a considerable number of rugged hills and immature ranges, the highest of which reach to about three thousand feet. The Nuba, the natives of these southern hills, unlike their relatives of northern Kordofan, have not accepted Islam, and still live on as genial naked savages, paying a small tribute to Sudan government, but otherwise maintaining their old habits and customs. They cannot be classed with the Nilotes, though it is possible that they are related to them, as they certainly are to the more civilized blacks of the hills between the White and Blue Niles within approximately the same parallels of latitude These people, or at least many of them, profess Islam, and tombs of orthodox sheykhs or holy men are to be found in many of their villages. But their old heathen practices everywhere permeate their new religion. The oval stone streaked with porridge and surrounded with offerings, which forms the headstone of a graye, is a survival of an old cult of stones such as is common among Semites (see illustration on page 718). Other survivals of the old beliefs are seen in such customs as that of a woman carrying a stone on her head in order that she may obtain a child (see illustration on page 717) at the ceremony held when one of her more fortunate sisters has given buth to an infant. So, too, tired women may seek case for their strained muscles by reclining against certain outcrops

Wrestling plays quite an important part in the life of the Nuba ,-ee illustration on page 7(9). Men continue their wrestling-matches until they have several children, when their strength is supposed to be impaired and they give up these court is: "Girls' wrestling-matches are held on some of the hills once a year, soon after the ingathering of the harvest. Girls between the ages of eight, and fifteen may take part, but a girl gives up wrestling after marriage and does not resume it any more.

Success and skill in these contests are marters of some importance, for the strongest and best wrestlers are the most admired by the opposite sex, and though vonths are not allowed to watch the girls wrestling they often do so surreptitionsly from a rock or tree at some distance, and the victors will certainly find most favour among them

The girls, wearing girdles of leaves, kneel in two lines facing each other, and the proceedings are opened by an old woman from each line bringing forward a girl. Each clasps her hands round her opponent's back, interlocks her fingers, and, straining and struggling, strives to trip up the other. The loser gets up without a murmur and joins her side, while the victor is received by hers with shrill cries and much dancing and singing. Any pair that seem equally matched are parted before long by the women, though this is often against the wishes of the combitants.

The men wrestlers are naked save for a belt hung with bunches of feathers and tails of sheepskin. The defeated man is expected to jump up into the air once with both feet together, while the victor is surrounded by his friends, sprinkled with wood ashes and lightly whipped with flexible sticks in order to make him strong and to prevent sickness. South of the Dinka and Shilliuk the Bari occupy the comparatively hilly country on both banks of the White Nile, their settlements being seldom more than thirty nules from the river. They are divided into sections, each having a chief who is recognized as the head of affairs in the community, and is a rainmaker, and therefore enjoys great prestige so long as he is believed capable of bringing the rain in the right season, but should be fail, there is, or was, every chance of his being killed.

The clief weapons of the Barr are finely-wrought lances and bows, with which they use much-barbed arrows made of worked iron. They seldom carry shields, as they are not easy to handle with bows and arrows, and impede their rapid movements, which are the chief feature of Barr

The properties accessors for the performance of the rammaking ceremony consist mainly of hollow blocks of pueses containing from two to eight pieces of rock-crystal or grantic, small earthenwaire pots holding about one pint of water each, and numerous non-rock. warfare. The men are warriors from childhood, and the boys are constantly practising the use of the bow and arrow and lances, in the handling of which they acquire remarkable skill

Both sexes are tall and the men very lank, lean and powerful; they go naked, but smear their bodies with ashes, or with red ochre and grease, while the women wear a tanned leather apron before and behind reaching nearly to the knees, and under this a neatly made fringe of strings of finely spun cotton thread suspended from a leather belt.

They are a pastoral people possessing large herds and flocks, but they also cultivate the land to a considerable extent, and grow quantities of corn, which they store in granaries made of wickerwork smeared with clay and cow-dung and thatched with grass. These granaries are supported on upright pedestals of hard wood or stone, in order to protect the corn from the ravages of the white ants, which are very numerous and which devour everything to which they can gain access.

Then huts are round and contain an inner chamber, which can only be approached on all foursthrough a narrow entrance, not more than twenty-four inches high. The walls of this niner room are composed of wattle and clay neatly plastered over with cement, and this chamber distinguishes the huts of the Barr from those of other Nilotic tribes. The huts are extremely neatly made, and each is surrounded by a small court covered with a cement made from the clay of the white ant-hills mixed with cow-dring and smeared with ashes, and these courts are always kept scripphously clean. All the movements of the section are directed by the sounding of a big drum, which is the property of the headman, and is suspended within an open shed, so that it is protected from weather, but can be heard in all directions. These drums are made from blocks of very tough wood, which are scooped out at both ends and covered with hide, they are sometimes of great size and so heavy that it requires two men to lift them.

Like the more northerly Nilotes, the Barrare tall and lank, with comparatively small heads and long necks, and are singularly long from the knee to the foot, with little calf development. Lake the Dinka, they will stand for hours in a strange attitude, recalling that of marsh birds, with all their weight on one leg while the other is bent with the sole of the foot resting against the knee of the supporting leg.

Unlike most of the Nilotic tribes, they seldom knock out the lower mesors, nor do they commonly scar their faces, as do many of the tribes belonging to the shorter, more round headed and lighter coloured

Nyam Nyam (Azande) group—They hunt the hippopotamus, attempting to spear them from rafts, but do scarcely any other hunting, though they do a certain amount of fishing

The rannmaking chiefs always build their villages on the slopes of fairly high hills in order to draw the rain more easily, as the moistine from the clouds is precipitated by the hills. Their huts are coincal in shape, and usually each is surrounded by a bamboo fence, while sometimes the whole village may be enclosed by a stockade. In the early years of this century the chief rainmaker was one. Ledju, who was believed to possess other extraordinary powers besides that of rainmaking; for example, he was supposed to be able to cause women to bring forth large families by performing over them a short ceremony with an uon rod about three feet long and one inch in diameter, which means, and one or more of these animals is killed and eaten by the party the rammakers con summe the larger share. When the feast is over the assistant rammakers go to the enclosure and remove the non rods and lean them against a cord stretched across the enclosure and seemed to the thorn fence on either side. They then wash the small stones and crystals with water from the pots, and replace them in the hollowed stones. Each assistant has his own particular stones which are under his special care and are known to him by name, usually by the names of former rammakers. The chief rammaker now makes his appearance, carrying a small pot of fat or vegetable oil, and squatting down near the stone "nests" he pours a little of the oil into the paim of his left hand, then setting down the pot, rubs his hands together, and taking the crystals and small stones one by one from the "nests," he rubs them with oil, chanting or mumbling to himself that so-and-so wants rain for his crops, therefore, "Oh, my father, send rain, send rain, send rain!" He also takes one he held over their heads and shook making the stones in the bulbs at the end of the rod to rattle, unittering meintations the while

The properties necessary for the performance of the rain ceremony consist manaly of blocks of guess hollowed out and resembling the grindstones used by many of the negro tribes of Equatorial Africa | They are arranged in a small enclosure and each stone comains from two to eight pieces of 100k crystal or gramte, comeal and circular in shape (see illustration on page A number of small carthenware pots holding about a pint of water each, are placed near the stones and "amerous iron rods, vary ing in size and shape, are laid across the hollow stones. Some of the Nuba of Kordofan have a somewhat similar rainmaking ceremony, and they also have a sacred spear, which is kept in a special house and brought out and used to kill the

If the cloud is hostile he seizes the rod as if in warfare, and prances up and down, gestion lating violently and calling out strange words in a loud voice The natives have the greatest confidence in the rammaker's power at the rainy season, though they candidly admit their disbelief in him at any other time, and if he fails to bring the rain when reducsted his life is threatened, and be may be obliged to leave the neighbourhood. Passing again southwards, we come to the Latuka, a fine frank and warlike race, described as a merry folk, always ready for either a laugh or a fight. They are very rich in cattle and protect them with great vigilance, often ejecting high platforms near the cattle kraals in order to keep a watch over the surrounding country, that they may not be surprised by the enemy and their herds looted. Their huts are generally bell-shaped, and have the appearance of huge candleextinguishers some twenty-five feet high, the roots being very neatly thatched and restingupon a wall not more than two and a half feet from the ground, the door is not more than twenty-six inches high, so that an entrance must be made on hands Perhaps the most distinctive and knees feature about the Latuka is their peculiar and elaborate style of hairdressing. Every tribe has its own distinct and unchanging fashion in this matter, but all form the han into a sort of helmet, which takes several years to bring to perfection Their thick woolly hair is interwoven with fine twine until it resembles a thick felt mat, and as the hair grows it is submitted to the same process until it becomes a compact mass about an inch and a half thick, which has been trained into the shape of a helmet (see illustration on page 734). The edge is sewn together with thread and forms a strong rmi about two inches deep, while a piece of polished copper, shaped like the half of a bishop's mitre and about a foot in length, is set up in the front to form a crest. If the owner is sufficiently rich the whole will be covered thickly with blue and red beads sewn on, and so beautifully arranged that the whole helmet appears to be formed of beads. The copper crest is surmounted with ostricle plumes and it iow of cownie-shells is stitched around the run, so that this elaborate head-dress has a most dignified appearance.

This is all the clothing worn by the I atuka men, while the women cut then hair short, and wear aprons of tained leather in front, and behind long tails, somewhat resembling those of horses, but made of fine twine and rubbed with red other, hanging from their waist-string. The women are very strong, as is shown by the size of the water-jars, which hold about ten gallons and are carried by them with ease for a nule or more when fetching water from the streams

To the north of the Victoria Nile there is a tribe of Nilotes called Acholi, who speak a dialect of the Shilluk language. Their weapons consist of spears with short narrow blades, and shields made of giraffe, ox, or rhinoceros hide, with small brass knobs at regular intervals all round them. Some of the Acholi pierce their ears and insert numerous earnings, but none of the true Nilotes enlarge the lobes of the ears as do the Masai. The Acholi build hits with roofs reaching to the ground, somewhat resembling huge bamboo baskets, the interior is daubed with black mud, the surface being made remarkably smooth, and bold designs painted upon it in red, white, or pale grey. These designs are either geometrical patterns or conventional figures of men or beasts.

The Barr, Latuka and Acholi tribes all make very good basket-work, and most of them work iron with the snichting furnace, forge and bellows similar to those used by the Bantu tribes. Then musical instruments consist of ox horns, drums, flutes, and a small stringed instrument something like a zither, usually made from the shell of a tortoise covered with a light piece of skin, over which five strings are strained with a bridge in the middle. Marriage is generally preceded by a more or less elaborate courtship in which the offering and accepting of presents is the chief event. It is said that women are seldom buried, but that their bodies are left for the wild beasts to devour, while men are generally buried in a trench outside the door of the but

To the west of the White Nile and north of the Bahr-el-Ghazal, the southern portion of the country between the Nuba fulls is occupied by Baqqara, i.e., cattle ewning Arabs with a good deal of negro blood in their veins, and settlements of morgrel Arabic speaking blacks, descendants of slaves who revolted and fled from their Arab masters a few generations ago. The chief occupations of the various Baqqara tribes are limiting for meat and skins, and occasionally for ivory, and herding then cattle Although they own a good many horses, they carry their baggage on bulls when on the move (see illustration on page 7.1). They are the most warlike people in the Sudan and were among the first to support the Mahor most of whose suctories were due to their fervent zeal and fariatical comage At the present day they are apt to resent being prevented from raiding the surrounding negroes Many possess rifles, but the true Bacgara tribesman arms himself with a large stabburg-spear and small throwing-spears, which, when he is mounted, are burg on the off-side (a) a kind of quiver. He also carries a proad-bladed straight sword, but does ne lose a shield. Further north, where the country is too dry for cattle to be the chief source of wealth, the herdsmen give place to camel-owing nomads, who may be sail to resemble the Arabs of Arabia more closely than any other people in the Sadan. $\lambda m'$ the wealthiest and most honourable of these tribes are the Kababish and the Kawai la, the former being the strongest Arab tribe in the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan

The Kababish occupy a large area of the poor steppe corear, west of ETOberd. In the south, in the least poor district, their flocks image with those of the sedentary tribes, but the greater part of the land included within their (ribal boundaries is so dry and sandy that it is capable of supporting little except cainels, so that in some of their wealth the Kababish own a somewhat insignificant number of cattle and greats, and rely to a great extent on their cainels for the milk which forms so important a part of their sustemance. In the dry season they live for the most part in the south of their domain, taking their herds to the wells to water them about every seven or eight days. About the end of June or the beginning of July, when the rains commence, they push as far as possible towards the north-west remain until the end of September or October. and then, when the rams have again ceased, they gradually tick towards the south-cast, going as slowly as possible, and pasturing their herds wherever food is obtainable weather gets cold, towards November and December, the camels are taken further and further afield in search of food, while the men of each section select spots to dig wells where they intend to spend the dry season. they remain as long as the water holds ont, if possible till the rams commence again, but sometimes the water supply fails about I chin ary, and then they are obliged to shift to a more permanent water-supply, and settle there until the ramy season, when they once more start on their travels

The Kababash use large square, flat toofed tents, perhaps the most comfortable in the world. These are pitched wide and comparatively low draining the winter season, and raised higher as the weather gets hotter until the rains commence, when the roof sheet is elevated and the walls of the tent contracted so as to form a roof with a pitch that will shoot the water off more easily. The shifting of camp is decided by the sheykh of the section, who announces the breaking of camp to his followers by means of a drum which he commands one of his slaves to sound.

The whole party, generally consisting of a number of relatives and their following of slaves and servants, collects at this summons and falls into line, the sheykh does not often lead, but he orders the direction the camp is to take, according to the information which has been brought to him by the emissaries he has sent out to prospect for water and grazing. He is recognized as the head of the party, and when the camp is pitched all the tents are grouped around his tent Kababish ladies use a ceremonial litter when the camp joinneys, above it is the smaller "nest," in which a child who is old enough to tend for itself is carried (see illustration on page 722) All the really great ladies also have very daborate ceremonial trappings thickly set with cowne-shells The women depicted dancing in the illustration on page 721 are negro captives, or their descendants. Kababish ladies do dance, it is true, but they do not mingle with then servants when dancing. Men also dance at special festivals, but, broadly speaking, this is regarded as clowning, and men of dignity or importance do not dance

Children are often betrothed when quite young, and spresents are sent by the boy's parents to the When both parties agree that it is time for the young couple to marry a day is fixed by the Feki, who is in theory a holy man, though in practice often anyone who can read and write a little The boy's father, often accompanied by the boy him self, goes with the Feki to the house of the gul's father, and a certain amount of bargaining takes place, after which a marriage agreement is drawn up by the Fekt. All arrangements concerning the marriage are made by the fathers, but the bride-price is paid to the mother, it would be shameful for the father to touch this. If the bridegroom is a really rich man, two or three she-camels are brought to the door of the girl's home and the tendons of their hind legs are cut, they are left in this state until the morning, when they are killed and some portions are sent to the mothers of the bride and biidegroom, the remainder being kept in reachness for the wedding feast. A small tent is erected by the bride's people in their village or settlement, and the bridegroom lives here for six days, his food being supplied by the bride's mother. On the seventh day a small temporary tent is set up in the same place for the bride who is taken there by her people, ineanwhile singing and dancing is kept up by all the women. The bridegroom mounted on the best horse he can borrow, approaches the tent, but refuses to descend from his horse until his father has made him a present. This consists of ten to fifteen sheep for a poor man or anything between five and one hundred she-camels for a rich man. As soon as the present

The bride is now carried three times round the tent, and then placed inside it, again accompanied by one female attendant, and these four persons remain in the tent for some time but the bride and bridegroom may not speak. Then the bride is taken back to her mother's tent, and the bridegroom remains in the tent for seven days, when the bride's people erect a permanent tent on the site of the temporary one and furnish it from her mother's tent. The bridegroom provides an animal, which is killed at the door of the tent, after which he enters and awaits the advent of his bride, who comes much adorned and attended by the women, she steps over the threshold and the bridegroom three times uncovers her face, which she three times recovers,

CHAPTER XXIX

THE CONGO By TOHN H. WILKS

INTRODUCTORY AND CUSTOMS RELATING TO THE HEAVE CHIEDHOOD

Into Conso people belong to the great Binth free that stretches from the Tast to the West Coast of Africa, and frem the Cape to five or six degrees north of the equator. Here and there through out this vast area are to be found small remnants or probably primitive tribes. Take the Hottentots Bushinen, and Py maes, that occupied the find before they were ousted or partially absorbed by the more powerful invaders. The Conge bantus are now divided into a large number of tribes possesing different tribal marks, such as we find on the Upper Congo or no marks whitever like the Lower Kiver Congos, a taking minimerable dialects only a tithe of which have been reduced to writing, and following a variety of customs that would demand many volumes to describe them fully. The purpose of this chapter is to deal more particularly with the Lower Congo natives, and to show such differences among the Upper River tribes is will interest the reader.

The Congo baby is surrounded with many chains and is the object of vinous superstitions rites. In anticipation of its arrival a female witch doctor is called who procures pieces of different kinds of fish and meat which she cooks. Then she threads a necklace of beads with a shell in the centre and to to this shell she puts a little chalk a certain leaf a pinch of salt and a portion of the cooked meats and fish. The expectant mother must lick this concoction every morning to ensure a healthy child used to all kinds of food. The prospective mother having received her charm the doctor—feeds her with some of the mixed fish and meats—and then a curious custom follows of the reason for which no one can inform me.—A fowl is cooked and a leg of it is put on one side for the eldest child of the coming mother (or, failing a child, for her sister or next nearest relative). The child must pretend to steal it, and as he runs away, the members of the family present make a feint at catching him, and shout after him, "Third!" Third!"

The new-born babe is washed with warm water, and a woman, other than the mother, nurses

the child for one day. When old enough it eats roasted cassava, or roasted peanuts, which have been first masticated by the mother, and the child is not weaned until it is about three years old. In the house of the new baby there is always a saucepan of hot water standing near the fire, and the man old or youngwho drops the first bead into it any time during the first two days can claim the baby, if a gul, as his future wife. No one else may marry her Only a man belonging to a clan into which the girl may marry will try to establish a claim in this way. Hair utter stranger or a man of the wrong clan puts a bead into the saucepan, it is returned to him, but if there is no kinship, or clair reason or any other proper objection why the person dropping in the bead should not eventually marry the girl, he will bitterly resent as a great insult the returning of the bead The saucepair is well granded, and only a very small percentage of the girls are bespoken in this manner. The bead thus given is regarded as a gift to the baby gifl, and enables the giver to set up an exclusive claim to her hand when she arrives at a marriageable age, but when the time comes the man will have to pay the marriage money usually demanded for a girl of her position. Or, if that amount is prohibitive. the man can claim the return of his "gift," and he can legitimately demand such a high rate of interest that a lawsuit may be necessary to settle the affair

Immediately the baby is born a new palm frond is shaker out and put over the door of the house to protect the child from dangers of two kinds. Should a fight suddenly happen in the town no enemy will dare inolest the house guarded by the palm frond; thus the mother and babe are secure from disturbance. And again, any person who eats the animal tabooed by the new baby's family must not enter the house, for example, if the taboo of the child's family is goat's meat, then anyone who eats goat's flesh must refrain from entering the house, or the child will become sickly, and perhaps die. At the end of the first month the palm frond is removed, as the child is then regarded as strong enough to be unaffected by such malign influences.

The folk, on hearing the name Lombo, know that the child is a girl, for if it were a boy its name would be Etoko, and they also know from the name given that the mother has dreamed of rimning water, snakes, or water sprites.—The sprites inhabit the streams, and the snakes live among the stones near the water-courses, hence to dream of snakes or running water is equivalent to dreaming child is thought to be old, and to have belonged either to a deceased person, to a living person, or to a water sprite. They have two reasons for believing thus. The child speaks early of strange matters the mother has never taught it, and this they think is the old soul talking in the new baby, and again, if the child is like any relative, it is regarded as having the soul of the person it resembles, and that that person will soon die. Hence, in Congo, if you say that a baby is like a certain person, that person is anything but pleased, for you have observed a likeness which proves that the child has her (or his) soul, and that she herself will soon die. Neither may you say that the baby is "fat" (maji), for they think you want "to eat it" in spriit, and the baby will quickly die, nor may you call it "a fine child," or the evil spriit (Ndoki) will hear you, and take it, ie, it will die. You may call it "stout" (mpongo) without giving any offence. Parents never count their children, lest the evil spirit should hear them and take some by death.

These belong to a tribe living on the banks of the Luborgo River a southern tributary of the Upper Conco. The tribal mark on the forehead is called a "cock's comb." Congo women do not like twins, because of the extra trouble, and v is the general practice to starve one of them. When a twin is thus starved, or dies a natural death, a piece of wood is carved into an image to represent a child, and it is put with the living twin, that it may not feel lonely. Should the second child die, the image is buried with it. The corpse of a twin is priced on leaves and covered with a white cloth, and is then buried at the cross roads like a suicide of a nin it killed by lightning. It is regarded as a hateful thing, and is buried in the most dishonourable of all graves. The first child of twins is always called Vsimba and the second Vuii, and the first baby borne by the mother aft i twins takes the name of Vlondh, as the second after twins that of Lokombo. A child been with six lingers is named Vgonga. Thus to bear these and several other names, is to know at once the birth history of the person bearing them.

"On the Upper Congo twins are not very common, but when they do arrive they demand proper treatment and the observance of certain rites. Three days after the birth of twins the mother takes them in her arms and dances in front of her house before her neighbours, who join in a chorus in which they sing over and over again. "The twins cry for you." The mother is decorated with leaves, sprays and twigs, the same as for an ordinary birth. These are made into garlands for her head, stuck into her waist-belt, and fixed on her wherever it is possible. At this ceremony the names are given, which are the same for every pair of twins—the elder Nkumu, and the second Mpcyc, and they are retained through life. Other folk may change their names according to fancy, but twins never.

"The first-born of twins is always carried on the right arm, and the second on the left arm. Whenever the mother replies to a salutation she must give two answers, one for each child, and should she greet anyone, she must duplicate her greeting, that each child may be recognized. She carries the dual idea further than that, for she must cat with both hands, that each child may be properly nourished. Presents are given in duplicate, or the child not receiving one will fret, become ill and die, and the sickness or death of either child is supposed to arise from carelessness in the observance of these rules. The twins are expected to cry together and rejoice together, and should they lack unanimity in either of these functions of rejoicing or sorrowing together, it is because one is sulky on account of one or other of the above rules having been broken. When one of the twins dies the mother borrows a baby of the same age and puts it with the living twin, that it may not fret." These two paragraphs are taken from the writer's book, "Among Congo Cannibals," and the ceremonies observed among the Boloki are, with slight modifications, found among most of the Upper River tribes.

Throughout the Congo the children have their make-believe games of marketing, cooking, hunting and tighting. Toy paddles for boys, and toy hoes for girls, are occasionally seen, otherwise Congoland is a toyless country, and very little is done to cater for the amusement of the children. The boys and girls, however, adapt the materials to hand for making models of houses, canoes,

Congo boys and girls must observe certain family taboos. The boys respect them all their lives, but the girls, on marriage, drop their own family taboos, and adopt those of their husbands in one family the inherited taboo is a prohibition against all birds, animals and fish having spots or marks, and the penalty for breaking the taboo is a very bad skin disease. There is also a temporary taboo which the medicine-man puts on a child when he (or she) is very ill, but this sort of taboo is removed later in life. The prohibited thing may be the shout of a pig, the head of a goat, certain kinds of fish, or particular vegetables. The prohibition is quite arbitrary, there being no relation whatever between the forbidden article and the disease.

When a boy (or girl) is very obstinate and disobedient, his father will curse him in the following manner—he cuts—off a piece of his own cloth and wraps some of his hair in it, and burning the little buildle, he says—"You shall never be rich, but shall be the object of bad luck."—The children are terribly afraid of these emises, and every ent, accident, illness, or bit of misfortune is placed to the credit of the curse—Perhaps, after a time, the boy afters his conduct, and becoming more amenable to his father's wishes, he expresses a desire to have the curse removed—The father then puts three small heaps of dust on each knee, and the boy kneels down before his father, who says—"I forgive you—I did not curse you miny heart, but only with my tongue, and now from this time become rich."—The fad thereupon blows off each heap of earth from the knees, and the curse is removed. Should the father die before the fad wishes to have the curse removed, he seeks out a namesake

The following is a mode of blessing a boy or girl who is either going on a long journey or has pleased his family. The father (or mother) pretends to spit on the child, and solemnly says. "May you possess all that a person should possess, may you have blessings and good lick, and may your words find favour with the people". Such a blessing is much coveted by the young folk. These taboos, cursings and blessings are found in various forms among all the Congo tribes.

CUSTOMS RELATING TO COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE

It is generally understood that the sons and daughters of one clan shall marry the daughters and sons of only one other clan, and not intermarry with several different clans. By this arrangement

A. BATEKE CHIEF

The Bateke tribe occupies a part of Stanley Pool and the hinterland of Tchumber. The chief is a man of position for he has the cowie shell hat on his head, the whisk of buffalo hair in his hand, a kind of accepte with which he emphasizes the important points in his talk, and is sitting on a leopard's skin, which only a rich man can procure

This tribe whose tribal mark is a line of keloids down the forehead lives on the Upper Mobanyi River, a northern tributary of the Upper Congo. The men dress their hour with white beads and cowire shells, and the result is very effective, as seen above they think better treatment is ensured for the women of each clan. The degrees of prohibition differ widely between the Lower Congo peoples, where Mother-right is in vogue, and among the tribes on the Upper Congo, where Father right is in full force. Among the former, a young man, having set his heart on a certain gul, is not allowed either to speak to her or to give her any presents; but to gain his sweetheart he must first take a calabash of palmi-wine to the surfernal incle, and tell him what is in his heart. Should the unde be inclined to listen favourably to the suit, he thanks the voing man and drinks the wine, but this, however, is simply a sign of his good will, and does not pledge him to give his nece to him in marriage. Having drunk the wine, he presents the young man with food, and arranges a day on which he will gave a decided answer. On the appointed day the sintor, carrying some more palmi-wine, revisits the gul's unde, who, having drunk the wine, states whether he is willing or not for him to marry his niece. Should he be willing he informs the young man that he wants one thousand, or two thousand, or may be five thousand packets of blue pipe beads (in a packet there are one hundred strings of one hundred beads each, costing two shillings a packet), according to the position of the gul's family and the suitor's wealth. The amount is often haggled over and reduced.

The main must now collect this large sum by trading journeys, etc., and when some months later the uncle is informed that the marriage money is ready, either in beads or their equivalent in goats, pigs, powder, cloth, etc., he takes some palm-wine and visits the young man's town to count the marriage price. That being satisfactorily done, after much chaffering about the value in beads of the pigs, goats, etc., a day is fixed for introducing the girl's father to his future son-in-law, and on that occasion both the uncle and the father take calabashes of palm wine to the suitor, who calls his briends, and all drink, first the incle's wine and then the father's, after which the marriage money is paid before witnesses, and the father receiving his very small portion drops entirely out of all the subsequent proceedings. So far as the uncle the father and intending bridgeout are concerned, the marriage arrangements are completed, but they cannot be consummated until the mother gives her consent.

There is usually a pretence of taking the write by force. When all is settled, the prindegroom goes on the appointed day with a few of his friends to the bride's town. As they draw near they fire their gins, shout and make as much noise as possible. This is not only a proof of the bridegroom's position, but is also a mode of honouring the bride. On a refunction there is a sham struggle, and at last the bride is carried off. The bridegroom are recurring to his town tells the young men to bring out the drums and plenty of palm wine, and for the next two of three days large crowds gather, much wine is consumed, guns are fired, and many goats and pigs are killed and eaten, and the hours are given up to singing, drumming, and dancing. The bride goes without food the day before her may rage, and the new wife does not cat in the presence of her 'arband for three or more morths.

When the crowds have gone, the clders give the gul into the hands of the young man, and they teach them in the presence of witnesses. To " Уон the woman they say are to respect your husband and his family, and you are to behave properly in your house" To the man they say "You are to respect your wife and her family, you must not speak harshly to her, nor treat her as a slave, nor stamp on her things, nor tread her beneath your feet " " And you, woman, you have never had thicking and witcheraft palavers, continue without them, and conduct yourselves properly towards one another". The young man then takes a witness by the wast, and rubbing a bullet on the palm of the witness's hand, he says "I have heard all the words spoken, and if I destroy the marriage may I die by this bullet." The woman also takes the same oath, whereupon the elders enter the house of the newly-married couple, and arrange the heart1 stones and instruct the bride in her duties as a wife. After these affairs have been completed the gnl's relatives are sent away with sintable presents and every token of respect. Tolk in poorer circumstances do not have so much eating, drinking and tiring of gins, but the festivities may be confined to one feast, and for a slave woman there is no ceremony, no feast and no dancing. The man has bought her, and he takes posses sion of her as he would a kinle, a piece of cloth, or a goat, she is his absolute property.

On the Upper Congo, the following customs relating to courtship.

On the Upper Congo the following customs relating to courtship and marriage are observed, with slight local variations, among the tribes. Very young girls, and even babies, are sometimes bespoken in marriage, and on the agreed-upon sum being paid to the girl's father, the man, in the presence of witnesses, puts a brass bracelet on the child's arm, saying "This is my wife", and when the child reaches a suitable age she is handed over to her hisband with some sugarcanewine. When a young man seeking a wife sees an imattached woman whom he likes, he may speak first either to the girl or to her father. and if they are agreeable to the suit, he calls some friends to accompany him to the father's house. The gnl is called, and the young man, taking his spear, goes into the centre of the crowd and sticks his spear in the ground, saying "If the girl loves me, let her pull up the spear." If the girl is willing to accept the man as her husband, she pulls up the spear, and carrying it to her father, she says. "I love him." Upon that confession being made, the "bespoke" money dish of tood, and often there is cohabitation before marriage, as the young man regards the girl, and speaks of her, as his wife

When the marriage money is almost, or quite, paid, the parents take their daughter and various kinds of food, together with a calabash of sugarcanewine, and go to the house of the bridegroom, and the bride is handed over by the father putting her hand in the hand of the bridegroom in the presence of witnesses These latter, after sharing the food and the drink, dance in honour of the occasion, and sing impromptu songs in praise of the newly-wedded couple. The food and drink brought by the parents are a token that their daughter has not been sold to the man as a slave, but is married to him as a free woman When the ceremony is over, the bride borrows all the imery she can of her female friends, and rubbing herself with palmoil, dusting herself with redwood powder, and decorating herself in her borrowed plumes, she parades the villages with her husband, that all may know that she is now his wife If her husband has already a few wives, they will dress the new wife in their own trinkets, and accompany her, as proof that she is a fellow-wife of their husband. This "honeymoon" lasts two or three weeks, during which time the husband supplies her with all the food she requires, and at the close of the "holiday" she resumes her farm work, and commences her life as an ordinary married woman.

A man may many as many wives as he can afford, but he must give to each her own house, an occasional present of cloth, and a certain amount of fish or meat during the year, otherwise he is regarded as very niggardly, and the domestic machinery runs unsmoothly. Throughout the whole of Congo the married men are not allowed to look upon their mothers-in-law, and directly a man hears that his mother-in-law is coning, he must hide, or, if that is impossible, then either she must conceal herself or one of them turn back. However, when it is absolutely necessary that they should have a talk upon some important matter, they either sit at a little distance back to back, or on different sides of a wall or house.

RELIGION AND SUPERSTITIONS

The name for a Supreme Being is found in all the Congo languages, but the knowledge concerning Him is very vague. He is regarded as the principal Creator of the world and of all hving things. It is thought among them that after His work of creation He withdrew Himself, and since then He has taken no further interest to the world and its inhabitants. He is spoken of among the natives as being strong, rich and good, so kind and good that He will be finit them, hence no sacrifices are offered to Him, be prayers to Him ever pass then lips, and they never wiship Him. As the Supreme One (Vrambi) is very remote from them, unconcerned in their welfare, and harmless, therefore there is no need to trouble about Hen. On the other hand, we sometimes hear women in great distress exclaim. "I wish Vambi had never made me" or "Vambi, pity me". But these sayings have no special meaning, and are samply used in times of gre" sorrow, etc. Again the phrase, "He died by an act of God," i.e., he died a natural death (there was no witcheraft about it), lenetthe deceased person is too poor or too unumportant to his family to bother about one igne a witch doctor to investigate the cause of his death and rick out the witch. If the deceased has left enough goods to pay the expenses, a witch-finder is employed to look into the matter, and then one or more persons are accused of witch craft, and the accused must prove their innocence by taking the ordeal. If their stomachs are weak and reject the drug, they are guiltless, but if their stomachs retain it, they eventually fall like drinken men, and are then beaten and stabbed to death

The natives are most concerned about the numerous spirits that surround them that can be muted to do evil to one's enemies, or induced to do good to one's own self, according to the power of the particular fetish they buy of the medicine-man. And they are also troubled by the witches that have power to inflict on them, bad, luck, misfortune, disease and death. If there were no witches, no spirits and no fetishes, there would be no sorrow, no sickness and no death. In fact, they believe that but for witcheraft, they would live for ever in an earthly paradise. Hence, then system of fetishism, their numerous fetishes, and then many witch-doctors, with their various ceremonies, have been devised to circumivent these malignant powers, and either protect the people from their malevolence, or punish those folk who, through sheer, wanton wickedness, allow themselves to be the mediums by which the spirits bewitch the people. So far as our inquiries have gone, no spirit can operate to hurt a person without the aid of a human being on the Lower Congo, or either a human being or an animal on the Upper Congo, and no family can be bewitched unless one of its members acts as a medium for the witcheraft

Witchcraft is the most dicaded of all powers on the Lower Congo, and in a smaller degree on the Upper also. To counteract it a man will beggar lemself in paying fees to witch-doctors and in buying chains and fetislies. There are witch-doctors who possess fetislies for inflicting and curing every imaginable complaint, there are others who will preserve their customers from every conceivable danger. Some will give good luck in stealing and cheating, and others will protect goods from such thieves, others, again, will give such smartness in lying and thieving that the owner of such a charm will never be detected. One witch-doctor promises to make his chent so acceptable to other people, that his neighbours will be friendly and will help him in all his enterprises. In business, in fights and then voyages beads, crosses, images, etc., and were themselves "fetish worshippers in a certain sense," they spoke of the various articles held in great reverence by the natives of those parts as fetiqos, or fetishes, and that name has come to be applied to all objects held sacred by the natives of Africa, and fetishism stands for their religious behefs.

Among the Lower Congo people there are over fifty different kinds of witch-doctors, and every tribe on the Upper Congo has its own set of witch doctors, more or less numerous, making the fetislies by which the people protect themselves from witchcraft, and preserve them selves in health and good link How do these medicine-men work? Each one has a bundle of charms among which the spirits delight to live, or upon which they like to feed, or the channs, with the same object of pleasing the spirits, are put into a fetish image to induce the spirit to abide in the image, and thus come under the control of the particular witchdoctor who owns the fetish-bag, a portion of the contents of which he has put into the image. But every medicine-man must have a fetish-bag containing a mixture of those charms that are supposed to be agreeable to the spirit that has the power to give or cure the same fetish does both -the diseases in which the "doctor" practises. What do these bags contain? Here are the contents of one opened by a friend of quarrels, in trading and love affairs, but as only a sich man can pay the large fee demanded, he really has already what he has paid for the respect and willing help of his poorer neighbours. However, should the charm fail in its purpose, it is because somebody else has a more powerful fetish, and if he wishes to have a stronger one to protect his interests, he has only to pay a larger fee and the witch-doctor will make the stronger fetish for him.

The word fetish comes from the Portuguese word fether, which means an annilet, a chaim, or a talisman The Portuguese were among the first to sail along the West African coast, and as they carried with them on

venient to carry than the bags, which are often large and cumbersome The image is just an ordinary piece of wood that has been carved to represent a man or woman, and occasion ally an annual and into it is put a bit of every charm from the letish-bag so as to make it effective Now when an ordinary person desires to buy a charm, he goes to the medicine man who pos esses a tetish having the power he desires to employ on 1 - own behalf, and on paying the reguired 4ce, the medicine man takes very small bits of all the charms from his bag and mixing them up thoroughly, he puts them into a small horn, or nito a shell, or into an image, and hands it to his customer. The hern is worn as a protective charm and does not cost much, the shell is dearer, because more powerful, and is either carried in its owner's shoulder-bag or left in the house, as it can act on its owner's behalf over any distance, but the fetish image is expensive, as it has practically the same powers as the "doctor's" fetish-bag possesses, and is believed to be able to do almost everything

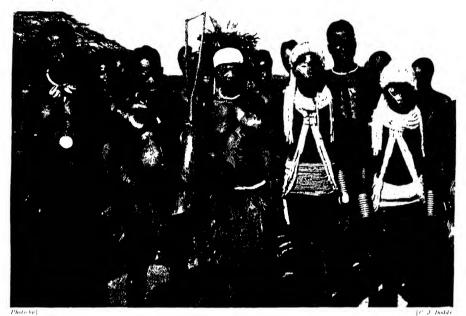

This is the only musical instrument allowed in the "lodge" of the secret society of the Country of the Dead, when the supposed dead engage in one of their observe dances

that its owner tells it. As only the rich can afford to buy fetish images, the superstitions regarding their powers are thus fostered

On the Lower Congo sacrifices are offered regularly to the fetishes. There is no thought of worship in the offering, and no prayers are presented when the sacrifice is made. The root idea is that in some way the sacrifice renews the power in the fetish image or buildle of charms. It refreshes the fetish, and enables it to perform more effectually its office of protector of its owner, punisher of his enemies, and imparter of good fortune. The sacrifice also appeases a sulky fetish, that it may exert itself on behalf of its owner. A fowl or goat is killed, and its blood is poured over the image or bindle, sometimes the toe of a fowl is cut and the blood is allowed to fall on the fetish, and even the toe of a frog is used for the same purpose. If the fetish is to be kept up to its full power, the sacrifice must be made regularly -cg, at every new moon, or on certain market days, and the larger the favours expected the more costly must be the oftening. Sunset is the time for killing a sacrifice, and the person who offers it must turn his face towards the sun. A pig is never offered as a sacrifice, and there are indications that it is regarded as an unclean annual. On the Upper Congo sacrifices to fetishes are not so much in evidence.

Supposing a man has a fetish to which he has regularly made a sacrifice, large or small, according to its importance, and it does not work properly, $i|\epsilon$, the owner continues to be unlucky in his

There are two phrases that contain the whole theory and practice of the Congo medicine-man's black and white magic. One is "Loka c nkisi"—to curse by a fetish, and the other is "Lombola c nkisi"—to soothe, appease the fetish and thus remove its curse. When a man thinks that he has been injured by a known or unknown enemy, and wishes to inflict on him a disease or even death, he goes to a medicine-man and pays him to curse the enemy by his fetish. The fetish is beaten with a stick, informed what it has to do, held in the air three times, near the ground three times, and then hung up outside the house, and the spirit of the fetish flies off to obey its orders. This

The burial of an important man is very costly. For many months the family sends to all the markets far and near to buy all the fowls, goats and pigs that can be obtained at a reasonable price. Having purchased sufficient, the invitations are sent out, and every invitation must be accompanied by a present of varying value from one fowl to two goats according to the position of the person invited. Each person thus invited takes with him as many wives, slaves and followers as he can, for the greater his retinue the more important he is in the estimation of others. Only forty or lifty persons may really be invited, but those who attend will number several hundreds, and they are all fed at the expense of the deceased's family. Every person invited to the funeral gives a present of trade goods, etc., according to his rank and standing in the district, and although the articles thus presented to the sorrowing family may be twice the value of the goats sent with the invitation, yet they will not pay for the pigs eaten and the palm-wine drunk during the funeral festivities, which last for several days. In 1882 I attended the funeral of a man who had died about thinteen years before. Nearly one thousand persons were present at the ceremony, which after the first day became a series of wild, drunken orgies. The deceased was regarded as a very great man, hence the family had been so long in making their preparations.

When a chief's body is to be builed, it is carried over all the town paths, and along the fronts of all the houses, for his spirit to say good-bye to everybody in the town; and the owner of each house fires a salute as the corpse passes. Sometimes the men carrying the corpse pretend that it will not leave the town, and a shain struggle ensues between them and the body to get it to the cemetery.

A DECORATED COPPIN MONGO

Among this tribe the coipse of an important man was washed by his slaves and then put in a hur for a month or more. Meantime an elaborate coffin was prepared, and the coffin was prepared and the coffin was prepared to represent spears, were burned on the coffin for his use in the spirit land. The coffin was carried through the villages to the accompaniment of music direct and dancing. Men who make these orfins receive large fees and many prequisites for their work.

It is interred at sundown, because they think that the spirit, which hovers about or in the body until burial, goes to the spirit town in the great mysterious forest, and as the spirit inhabitants, like themselves, are away from the town engaged in various occupations through the day, and will have returned by the late afternoon, they will be ready to accord a welcome to the new-comer

All the articles put on the grave are "killed," $i\,c$, broken, that their spirits may go to their late owner

The customs and ceremonies here described are observed, not only on the Lower Congo, but with slight modifications among the tribes on the Upper Congo. The spirits of inland people, after being for a time in the nether regions (longa), haunt the bush and keep the animals from being caught by the hunters, and the spirits of the riverage folk haunt, the rivers and time the fish from the lish-traps, but the witch-doctors can catch these mischievous spirits for the hunters and fishermen, and imprison them in calabashes.

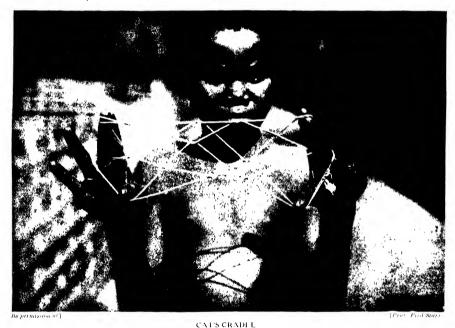

MISCELLANEOUS

There are various secret societies among the Congo tribes. On the Lower Congo is the Net a Lea, or " Country-of the Dead When there is an epidemic of sickness or a low barth rate in a district, a witch-doctor starts a "lodge" for mitrating as many persons of all ages and both sexes as care to join this society. The candidates for membership fall down in a cataleptic state in the market places and towns, and are thus carried into the "lodge," where they remain from six months to two, or even three, years. The "lodge" is in a dense part of a forest, and is run as long as it pays the "doctor" and his assistants. The initiated are said to die, and then bodies are supposed to decompose until only a bone of each person is left, and the families of the "dead ones" take large quantities of food daily and place outside the "lodge" to feed the "doctor" and his helpers that they may have strength to turn over the bones of the " dead " To die, ndembo, with all its ceremonies, mystifications, etc., is supposed to give the initiated new bodies free from disease and capable of bearing children. The folk in the "lodge" go naked, and at their dances a stringed instrument only is used and no drums. The "lodges" are the centres of much obscenity, and for this reason in some parts of the country they are absolutely forbidden by the native chiefs. There is another society, or guild, called Nkimba into which only males are admitted. The members rub themselves with pipeday and wear crinolines of grass or pahn fibres. They have a strange trilling (iv), and with their daining and screaming, their ghastly whitewashed faces and bodies, and the rustling of their fibre dresses, they frighten the folk into compliance with their demands for food and money, and are able to wreak their hatred on their enemies. This guild was probably started to protect native traders, while traversing the country, from the extortions of the various chiefs, and to help one another in their journeys and business, but the guild became strong, and

The entrance-fee was about ten shillingsworth of trade goods, on the payment of which the candidate was turned round and round until he became giddy, and was carried unconscious into the "lodge," where he stayed until he had learned the secret language of the society. Near Stanley Falls there is the secret society of Libeli, with its magic word "Libea"—only to be intered of the initiated, its secret grove in the dark forest, where the spirits perform whimsteal tricks, and its curious acolyte's dress of initiation leopard skins and teeth. Only the young men and lads of the district can join, and after initiation they can scare the women and girls by the utterance of their mystic, magical cry of "Libea." On the Kasar there is a ghoulish secret society, the members of which dig up the buried bodies of the dead and feast upon them under cover of the night. Both men and women belong to this society.

CHAPTER XXX

SIERRA LEONE By T. J. ALLDRIDGE, 180

The Menchs are the largest tribe within the Protectorate of the British Crown Colony of Sierra Leone on the West Coast of Africa, inhabiting a considerable tract of country on its eastern and south-eastern sides, the latter being bounded by the Mano river, close to the Negro Republic of Liberia. The Menchs are pure negroes, of ordinary stature, well formed and of good physique, both sexes having remarkable powers of endurance, they will toil from daybreak to dusk under the burning sun, either in cultivating their ground or in preparing the fruits of the indigenous orlipalities, and are, in fact, a hard working people, although many persons casually visiting their country frequently call them lazy. The Up-country aborigines are essentially tillers of the soil, but with the abolition of the slave trade, the advance of civilization, the introduction of railways, Governmental supervision, and the great facilities now offered for procuring cheap imported articles, many of their most important industries are fast disappearing, and with them some of their patharchal manners, customs and ceremonies, which so much impressed early travellers through this, until recently, practically unknown country

Before the establishment of British rule Mendiland was cutricly governed by the chiefs through secret societies, and although it has been necessary to restrict their operations in certain directions, they are still an enormous force for good or evil.

SECRET SOCIETIES

OF these societies the principal are the Poro—for men and boys (see illustration on page 768)—and the Bundu—for women and girls. The word 'Poro' means, in the first instance, "Law"; but it is commonly used as the name of a vast and all-powerful organization, that is really a Sworn Brotherhood, whose business is conducted with the absolute secrecy of Freemasonry—No outsider can penetrate its inner mysteries, but there are sundry public observances during which Poro men and boys will submit even to be photographed, now that they are no longer afraid that the camera may be some bad white "medicine"

The Poro is paramount over the whole of native life. In its assemblies all objections, whether political or social, are discussed and settled. Its political meetings are usual held quite close to the town, but can only be attended by full members, who have previously undergone a very severe initiation under the tuition of the "order". The meeting-place is a clearing in the forest, and is called "the Poro bush." The power of the Poro was formerly quite unrestricted. Before its tribunal a person might be "aca, executed and finally builed within the Poro bush, and the outer world know absolutely nothing of the circumstances of the case, as it would be practically impossible to get a member of the order to break his "swear". The Poro order has three degrees

It is from the Chief's degree that Poro law emanates. In its great council the Poro cabinet arrives at its decision, which the lower degrees must carry out.

The Mendis have no written language, so it is necessary to have, as means of communication, trustworthy messengers—called Wujas—and these can always be found in this fraterinty, every member of which has been sworn upon country "medicine," presumed to be capable of acting tatally upon him should be divulge any secret thing seems in some sort connected with an evil influence which has to be propitiated by some rite or some outward symbol, such as hanging stones from trees, etc. As soon as they are born children come under this evil influence and must be protected, they are therefore embellished by quantities of fetish charms of the rudest description, small metal rings, bored cowire-shells, old agate beads called "Tingor" and little "hawk-bells" being of special potency.

As the children grow up they enter either the Poro or Bundu, their initiation being surrounded by the greatest mystery in the seclusion of a special." BUNDU DEVILS

There is generally a Bundu devil in any large town, and her fetish power is very great. She sits among a crowd of people and officially inquires who is the author of some misdemeanour. herring-bone pattern, which is permanent and by which a Poro member can always be recognized. The imitation is very severe, but arrangements are made for occasional relaxation outside their "bush," which generally takes the form of a dance in the town to which their Poro bush is affiliated. The final ceremony of imitation is called "Pulling the Devil"

The Poro devil is supposed to be in the Poro bush, although the people know that he is a man, they attribute to him all kinds of weird powers, and he must in some way be got rid of before the boys can leave their bush. The day previous to their coming out the boys twist a long-rope of the Poro emblematic fern, called "Kane," and during the night they pass it from the upper branches of a tree in the Poro bush to trees outside. The people of the town and surrounding villages are awakened by great shouting, are shown this rope, and are told that by its means the devil took his departure to the sky. The boys then parade the town, and after further secret cereinonies become members of the Poro order.

The Binni (see illustration on page 760) is the second degree of the Poro, and is open to Muhammadans. The devil of this degree is an extra powerful devil, as he unites in his own person the fetish influence of the pagan with the mage of the Muhammadan Mori-man His costume is one of the strangest worn by any of the fetish devils. His body is enclosed in a cumbrous dress of long fibre, the head-gear is of skin with side flaps, the face is entirely concealed, but there are two small holes cut in a large skin flap for the eyes to see through This is all pagan, but the Binni's breast and back are strictly all Muhammadan, being hing with many little wooden tablets covered with Arabic writing that have been charmed by the itinerating Mori magician. As the Binni moves on, he is constantly shaking, and all these little tablets rattle and add to the general pandemonnin caused by the joyous shouts of the people and the sound from some half hindred of small lengths of bamboo which are continuously struck by the musicians accompanying the procession.

Sometimes, in the death-like stillness of the early morning, the silence will be gently invaded rather than broken by a weird sound, that once heard can never be forgotten. It is one long-drawn note, soft at first, which grows londer and then gradually dies away. This the traveller in Mendiland recognizes as the peculiar and inivarying chant, or rather wail, of the girl-initiates of the great

Bundu sisterhood, that wall tells him that he is in the neighbourhood of a Bundu "bush"

The Bundu, which in many respects resembles the Poro, is worked with even more secrety, and its young guls are protected, in the public opinion, by a "fetish medicine" of terrible power, which would take action upon any man who approached the sacred precincts of their "bush" to spy out its mysteries, or who interfered with the initiates during their probationary stage. As a matter of fact, the men, not without icason, regard the Bime'u besh with dread, so in the most seeluded parts of the forest the young girls in the Bimdu by a with only a few of the elder women as their custodians, are absolutely safe against introders and their knowledge of their sacred seclusion greatly adds to the feeling of soleminity which the Bindu girls' strange chant suggests, and which the chilly morning air and the otherwise imbroken silence intensity.

In the carefully hielden' bush," a cleaning in the forest in which are put up a few wigwains, in what may be called an open-air convent, the girls are unitated into certain customs pertaining to their country and sex. I like the Poro, the Bundu has three degrees. The Digbas, the lowest or first degree, the Normelis, or Bundu devils, in the second degree (see illustration on page 771), and the Sowelis, or head-women, in the third or highest degree. It is not compulsory to become a member of the order, but a large majority of the women join it, as membership confers considerable social status with proportionate privileges. While in the Bundu bush the initiate receives her Bundu name, by which she is afterwards known. In all Bundus the names are the same, thus number one is always Kehma, and the others run up in regular sequence kehma, Tauloma, Bandi, Yassa, Soko,

Although so much investery surrounds their training while in the bush, the elder women in charge sometimes bring the girls out to public view to sing and dance (see illustration on page 777). performance by prostrating themselves on the ground, and in that supplicating position chant their morning and evening hymns, so concluding a most impressive and solemn ceremony. Dancing forms no inconsiderable part of the Bundu girls' training while in their secluded retreat. They are frequently brought out in their gala dress to perform before their fainthes and friends, which performance is always greatly appreciated by a large audience. Seligura players are in attendance and provide the music to which the girls dance. This instrument is a small hollow gourd, with a longish neck, covered loosely by a netting of country cotton on which are string the small split shells of seeds, giving out a pleasant sound when shaken by the women (see illustration on page 767). The girls dance together and also execute very excellent pas seuls in the most creditable manner, and after a well performed and difficult dance some of the elderly women present rush excitedly into the arena, embrace the successful dancer and at once commence to besmear her face, neck and shoulders with a liberal supply of palm oil, anidst the frantic yells and gesticulations from the onlookers.

Many of the girls upon entering for initiation are betrothed, and will be presented to their mane's after their term of probation has expired, and they have been "pulled" from the Bundu and medicinally "washed." Much native ceremony is publicly gone through the day before the "washing," when the Sowehs, Bundu devils, and all concerned parade the town, creating a perfect pandemonium. Subsequently an open-an meeting is held in the town to show off the initiates and to enable the Sowehs, Kambehs and devils to receive the presents of the would-be husbands of the brides-elect, in appreciation of the care and trouble bestowed upon them while in the Bundu bush (See illustration on page 778.)

To the constraint | [C. II. Lieman BUNDU GIRLS WHILENED

Dancing forms no inconsiderable part of the Bundu girls' training in their retreat, and they are frequently brought out to perform before their families and friends. The principal adoranient is the dressing of the girls' bodies and faces with strange markings produced by the smearing on by the fingers of a substance called 'work, composed of white clay and animal fat

On the day of "washing," whether the girls are affianced or not, they are all brought out of the Bundu bush and marched in procession round the town, with their women-relatives and the devils, the head medicine-woman or Mashu leading. This procession is called "Tiffeh," from the leaves which the women-followers carry on the occasion. Afterwards the initiates are taken to another part of the bush, where they receive their "Soboro," or devil cap, which consists of plastering a quantity of black mud, medicinally prepared, over then heads. They are then marched to the water-side to wash off this "medicine," which being done, the initiates have completed their course within the Bundu and are members of the order

Before receiving their freedom, however, they must remain for three nights in the chief's barri, or court-house, under the charge of the elder women, during which time they are gaily dressed and allowed to walk about in the day to see their friends and to receive presents. Only those who are betrothed receive the devil cap and have it washed from the "medicine"; the others simply have their faces washed. It is beheved that if any girl, after leaving the Bundu, misconducts herself with a man, that "medicine" will catch the delinquent, and give him a sickness that only the Sowehs can cure, and should a girl become engaged she must return to the Bundu bush to wear the devil cap, be medicinally "washed" and diessed by the Sowehs in the clothes provided by her parents or the hiisband-elect, after which she will be presented to him with native ceremony.

Next in importance to the Bundu is the Yassi, which works to a certain extent with the Bundu. It is a society professedly for women, but does not object to give "medicinal treatment" to men of the Poro order—All Yassi women must belong to the Bundu, although Bundu women need not belong to the Yassi—The supreme head of the order is the Mama

Like all other secret societies, the Yassi has a medicine of its own, generally a mash of herbs and leaves, specially prepared, not for taking internally, but for the exercise of a mystic influence, peculiar to itself. It is kept in the Yassi house, which is not in the bush but in the town or village. It is an ordinary thatched much hut, distinguished only by its spots. The Minseri images are kept near the medicine, with which they are believed to co-operate, in a place partitioned off by mats.

When someone wishes to consult the Yassi Medicine, he or she must in the first instance approach the Yamama or the Kambeh who is in charge of the oracle, which the prophetess then works some what in the following way. Diessed in a white wrapper with a white keichief on her head, she enters the sanctum, where she at once takes off her attire, as she is not permitted to wear clothes in the presence of the "medicine." After a while she reappears in the white costume, walking backwards and carrying a Minseri with its front to the mat. Presently she turns round to the people with the face of the image towards herself. With both hands she holds the Minseri round the waist, so that she can work it to and fro as on a pivot. She then puts leading questions to the figure, such as the following, in the case of a sick man supposed to be attacked by the Yassi fetish.

" Did this man spy us when we were making our Yassi medicine?"

Should its heart be cold (that is when the figure intends a favourable answer), the Minseri bends until it tests upon the Kambeh's chest, and means:

"No, he did not spy you"

This represents part of the extension of 'pulling from the Bundu'' before the actual "inchernal washing" takes place. On the light the Sowchs, who are waiting for the husbands elect to give them presents in return for the cut they have taken of the just in the bush.

If the image maintains a wooden silence the man is doomed to die, and in many cases does die, either from terror or from one of those mysterious causes common among behavers in fetish Everybody is perfectly satisfied with the decision, as its judgment is considered infallible, and its powers as great as they are mysterious. These powers, so a Yamama informed the writer, are imparted to the Minseri when it is anomated with the Yassi medicine, without which it could not perform its functions. After its anomating it can communicate with the medicine.

At the funeral rites for a Yassi woman, the body, covered by a country cloth, is placed upon a mat, which the women of the order carry round the house, dancing and singing to the noise of the long wooden drum and the shake-shake senguras of the women. The dancing procession is headed by the Kambeh Mama, who points before her a long drawn sword, and another Kambeh carries the

This is spent by the Yassi women in dancing and singing inside the spotted medicine house (see illustration on page 78;) They are then in a state of complete nudity, the beads, broken by the violent movements of the dancing, having fallen off. After the body has been danced round the house, it is taken uiside, and some of the women who took part in the dance are selected to prepare a certain medicinal concoction called "Sawch," consisting apparently of leaves which are masked with water in a wooden bowl. One or two fowls are killed and dipped in their feathers into this liquid compound, which is then sprinkled by means of these fowls upon every house in the town and upon all persons who are not of the Yassi order, so that the spirit of the deceased may not is politely disgnised by such terms as "betrothal presents," "wine-money," and so on. Money or its equivalent always has a good deal to do with the matter

A great chief may have as many wives as he can pay for, and as these ladies bring with them several domestics who help with then labour, he naturally acquires as many wives as he can afford to provide for, as he considers them profitable, especially as native women of social position have such good administrative capacity that the chief will deleg to some of his wives to represent him in the villages near to his own residential town.

At the present time man riage is preceded by a formal betrothal. negotiations for which must be conducted with The would-be due ceremony husband does not approach the girl himself, but deputes a small party of friend, one of whom must be a weman, perhaps one of his own wives, to arrange preliminaries Annyed at the girl's home, the party will open the business by presenting two or more Sola-nut or perhaps a "ship head" of American leaf-tobacco that is, a head of tobacco as it is taken out of the imported hogshead, accompanied by a bottle of rum or a flask of gin. This denotes that the visitors have come upon important business and are anxious to have an interview. An interview with the relatives being granted, a present for the gul herself, such as a Madras handkerchief for the head, is offered, by way of opening up the subject, with some such pretty remark as "We see a beautiful gem in your house, and we come to get it, we bring this present for her.'

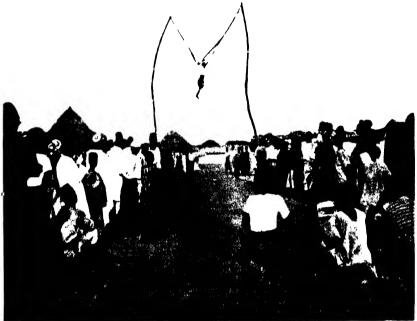

The Yassi but is only distinguished from the other buts in the village by being dailed with white, red or black spots, or a combination of all three colours. In it are kept the sacred images and medicine of the society.

A girl may be betrothed almost as soon as she is born, but supposing she is old enough to make a choice, the present is shown her, the object of the deputation explained to her, and although she may never have seen the aspirant to her hand, she may either accept or refuse the present. If she accepts it, it is tantamount to consenting to the engagement and she will send him a return present. The way is then clear to treat with the parents, which is an expensive affair, as "wine-money" has to be paid or arranged for "Wine-money" has no fixed value, but naturally the bigger the "wine-money" the greater the hold upon the girl, who has then little chance of breaking her engagement.

Sometimes additional privileges are desired. It may, for instance, be thought well that the girl should make a "life inarriage", that is, that, in the event of the husband dying, the wife should remain married to the family for her life-time and should become the wife of one of its members, a custom which prevailed among the Jews of older times, and on which the Jewish idyll of Ruth and Boaz is based. In Mendiland such an extra privilege must be paid for.

Sometimes in the Mendiland bush one comes across two little erections of sticks and grass thatch of a very primitive description near together, one, however, being smaller than the other. These are known as "Twin honses," because they are associated with the Sabo Medicine, which can only be worked by twins (see illustration on page 781). These twins need not be the children of the same parent, but, irrespective of sex, the elder, to which the larger of the little houses belongs, is called the Sau, and the vounger, who presides over the smaller house, the Jina. One of these twins has the Fera-Wun, or twin stick, that is, has the power to set up the little temples and to administer the fetish medicine that, to be efficacious, must be deposited beneath them.

Both sexes may apply to the Sabo, but its help is more frequently sought by women than men. The applicant must not go direct to the twins, but must first consult a "Tor-Tor Behmor," or "country fashion" man. This personage is many degrees below the Muhammadan Mori magician, and is more readily available when quickly required. he works "country fashion," his charms are at hand, frequently consisting of stones, little bundles of made-up concoctions, and all kinds of things, either for wearing about the person, placing on trees, on pathways, around houses and so forth.

If the country fashion man finds that a woman is under the twin inflaence she must be washed in the Sabo medicine and go to the expense of setting up the twin houses. In the case of a married woman the Tor-Tor Behmor will often suggest that the Sabo fetish would be much more efficacious if the husband also submitted to be washed. He will agree, and there will be further fees.

Fees being duly paid, the For-Tor Belimor arranges a faceting between the patient and one of the officiating twins, who decides upon a public dance when the next new moon appears. This is kept up all night, and at daylight the Sabo women go are the bush to collect materials for the setting-up of the little twin huts and for making the abliitionary medicine, which preparations must be accompanied by seligura music. When sufficient material has been collected, the Sabo men begin at once to erect the twin houses. When they are finished a long strip of white cloth is put on a flag-staff in front of the house to be used, true and fowl are cooked and some of it eaten by the Sabo people. The officiating twin then bows to the house, goes through various meantations, the medicine is produced and the washing ceremony begins. The patient sits on a mat spread on the ground. A few grains of uncooked rice are put upon her feet, into the palms of her hands, upon the top of her head and on her protruding torque. The twin stands over the patient holding a live fowl.

"Heat is true," she says, "that this woman has been caught by the twin spirit this fowl must let everyone see that it is so by eating up the rice."

The fowl is then set down and loses no time in gobbling up the rice, after which no doubt can remain that the patient is under the twin fetish. She drinks a little of the highid medicine and is washed in the remainder. She then uses , a fresh cloth is given her , she leaves the white cloth

FUNERAL CUSTOMS

The Mendis as a rule believe in a future existence or, at least, that man, when he leaves this world, becomes a spirit, but in Mendiland, as in so many other places, that spirit is dieaded, and as soon as a person dies he or she is to be feared and must be propitiated method of propitiation is known as " Stocking " which the writer saw undertaken by a man and woman whose sister had died the day before. So that the dead woman's spirit might not return to trouble them, or perhaps even take their lives, they had "stocked" themselves that morning and would remann "stocked" nntil sunset, when they might hope that nothing umpleasant would happen illustration on page 700)

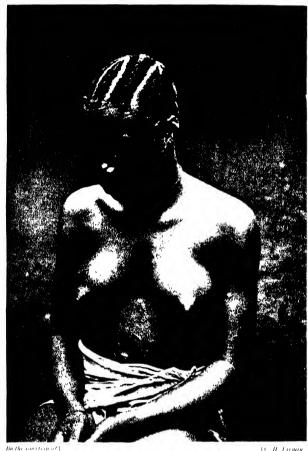

Four days after the death of a male, or three days in the case of a female, the ceremony of "Tewe-jama" is performed, when the relatives cook for the dead "Tewe-jama" means "Crossing the water," the idea of the River of Death being familiar to them, as to us, and beyond the river there is a long journey. On the evening before the third or fourth day, as the case may be, the friends go to the grave and the head of the family says something like this. "We come to let you

The nose is in most cases pronounced and hooked, and in spite of what the Mendi man may believe, they are distinctly the work of human hands, but as to whom the makers of them were, no positive knowledge remains

One of the principal characteristics of the Mendi people of all classes is their love of music. the cry" for a great chief is a serious matter, there is much wailing and lamentation and the consumption of great quantities of spirits for the con-oling of the mourners, and possibly a bullock may be killed for the feast. singing and dancing. The schgura for the women and the saughor or tour-tour for the inen are practically the only instruments used by the Mendi tribes. (See illustrations on pages 785 and 786.)

One would hardly think it possible to obtain any sort of harmonious sounds from either of these primitive instruments, yet the practised seligura shaker can produce so many modulations from the hollow gourd that it can be made to give out quite melodious tones, which, after a time, become not at all distasteful even to the prejudiced taste of the imappreciative European. Not only are seligura women present at native ceremones, as well as at public and private rejoicings, but when a singer is giving a solo her unvarying accompanists are seligura shakers.

With the Mendi men then delight is in the sangbot or toni-tom, which they are ready to beat

The instrument is merely a hollowed-out piece of the silk-cotton tree covered by skin like a drinn and kept very tant by a lacing of strong strips of skin around the wooden body. The difference between the drum and the tom-tom is that the former is beaten by drumsticks while the latter is beaten by the palms of the hands, both hands being used

There are a few games peculiar to the Mench country, but that universally played is "Waii," a real game of skill full of strategic movement. It is played by two persons on a small board cut out of a solid block of wood generally shaped like a surf-boat and standing upon a low pedestal. On the top of the board on each side are six holes, deep and wide enough to admit the tips of the first and second fingers of the right hand, these holes are called "towns," each hole or town being garrisoned by four war-boys, usually represented by beans. The twelve towns being occupied by their proper complement of war-boys, it is the object of one party to vanquish or "cat up"

Round the stave are seen a circle of empty sen bottles and the amount of spurits consumed shows the emportance or the decreased. the other. The game continues until the armies are both so reduced that no more remain on either side, the victorious player being the one who has taken most prisoners. Every town will possess a "warn" board, and so infatuating is this game to the Mendi man that he will have a game whenever the opportunity arises, and the writer has very often watched persons playing with the greatest interest and marvelled at the adrottness with which the beans have been handled, three beans being frequently dropped singly into three following holes by a twist of the wrist

The popular game called "Se" presents greater gambling facilities, masmuch as four persons take part in it (see illustration on page 780). It consists of each player spinning into a mat a small top, said to be cut from elephant bone. The four tops are spin into the mat one after the other, each player hoping that as the tops collide his own will knock one or all of those of his opponents off the mat, and he will win from the man whose top has been displaced. In former time human beings were staked and played for "Jiggi," another great gainbling game, is played with four cownessfiells, the convex tops of which have been cut off. A player takes the four shells, throws them up with a dexterous twist, clicking his first and second fingers as the shells leave his hands. The shells fall upon the ground, if the two tops or two bottoms are uppendent it is a win, similarly if all tops or the reverse, but three tops or the opposite are a lose. Six or more persons can play at it, each taking a turn. "Ke" is a scientific game, and not nearly so commonly played. The board is a solid piece of wood marked out in black and white squares, the pieces used are the small conical excrescences that cover the trunks of some of the large trees, they are of two sizes, the larger ones being called the men, the smaller the women. The moves are identical with draughts.

CHAPTER XXXI

WEST AFRICA By MAJOR A J N TREMEARNE, M.A., Dep. Auth., Barrister-ut-Law

INTRODUCTORY AND DRESS

WEST ALRICA has always been a rich mine for the authropologist, because, the conditions of life in that portion of the continent being on the average much more difficult and inhealthy than those obtaining in other parts, the more primitive races have been gradually driven there. More than that, when once there, even when flying before a common pursuer, the remnants of the tribes did not mix to any appreciable extent, and even to day one can find in Nigeria and elsewhere peoples a few miles apart speaking a different dialect, even if not a distinct tongue, and always at enmity with one another. Thus each little community preserved its own peculian beliefs and ceremonies, and there could be found a parallel in West Africa for most of the customs of the world. Owing to the tales of its richness in gold, the Gold Coast (of which Ashanti is a dependency) has been better known than other parts, and it is only lately that the newer European possessions have been opened up and described. Even now, there are many tribes in the limiterlands between the Niger, Lake Chad, and the ocean which are practically unknown.

In West Africa the term "dress" covers everything from almost absolute nakedness to the European outfits which have been adopted by the clerks. Babies usually wear nothing at all for the first year or so—with certain tribes until the age of five or six—but sometimes they will have a gridle of string, or even of beads—In a few towns along the boundary between Northern Nigeria and what was once I agos the women remain stark naked until married

As the child grows up, however, it is almost certain to have something in the way of diess

Many Nigerian wonien as a rule attempt to enhance their personal appearance by sears or tattoorny, though they have no choice in the patterns upon their faces, which are tribal. The lines shown on the face of this woman were painted on, and not produced by creatrization.

and ornament Amongst the Head-Hunters of Northern Nigeria a gul's lips (and sometimes her nose also) will be pierced for the reception of little discs of wood, the holes being at first small, and then gradually enlarged by the insertion of stalks of grass and sticks until they are able to hold the much prized discs, which are often ornamented with seeds, beads, or tin

In many tribes the children are scarned, and amongst the Hausas by the marks on a person's face even the town to which he belongs can be determined, and his trade interied.

These marks are done at an early age, and later on others may be added, amongst the Head-Hunters a gul being scarified on reaching puberty and again on mar-In other countries the gul is diessed up in all the finery which she can provide or borrow, and parades the town to notify to all eligible bachelors that she is open to offers. Very often a chastity-apron or gridle is worn by girls until married Coloured earths also are coated upon the faces or bodies, not only during bundu (as is mentioned elsewhere), but on other occasions, sometimes it is used simply for ornament

Marriage may not make much difference to the dress of a man, but there will almost certainly be something in the way of a trousseau for the woman. The Head Hunters don leaves before and behind, and a tail of palm-fibre, the Keddara have one of string, the cannibal Gannawarri wife wears a puzzle-chain of non-rings which clarks as she walks—not at all a comfortable garment, if such it may be called. Other women in the district merely bind up then loins more securely, but in certain parts an upper cloth is added to the woman's attire, and this will be useful later on, for in it will be wrapped her baby.

A man may wear something distinctive for fighting, even if it be only a kind of war-paint, and if he manages to kill an enemy he is almost certain to have something to show afterwards in the way of a war medal Lastly, even amongst the almost naked peoples, e.g., the Attakka, there will be some change made when in moniming (e.g., in shaving or in not shaving the hair), and amongst the more covered tribes, the Muhammadan Hansas, for instance, the changes will be all the more noticeable.

BIRTH AND CHILDHOOD

THE bith of a new member of a community is always regarded with at least in terest by the other meni bers, and in some cases these others usin p functions which in more civilized countries are usually left to the mother The mother is often segregated, for not only are she and the child supposed to be a source of danger to other people, but they are also in a state of dangerous receptivity Sometimes, as is the case on the Gold Coast and else where, she returns to her father's house for the event

Normal births are usually a cause of rejorcing, for an increase in the community means that it will be better able to defend itself, and food being plentiful in such a fertile country there is not the same reason for infanticide as is the case elsewhere. But certain tribes, e.g., the Youbas and others in Southern Nigeria, regard twins with abhorience, and used to kill, not only them, but the mother also on at least drive her away from the village, though with the Hausas even triplets are thought licky. In Liberia the Kiu would kill boys, and keep gails if twins, but would destroy all if more than two were born. With the Ibo-speaking peoples, not only twins, but many head shaved, it is given two names, one of which is whispered into the child's ear alone, the other being aumoniced to the company. The malains their bless the child, ask Allah to preserve it from witcheraft, and bless the breasts of the mother

With the Pilam on the naming-day of the first son, the friends and relatives of the newly-made parents assemble under a big tree. An ox is killed and flayed, and all is apportioned in accordance with certain rules, except the heart and the flesh covering the stomach. These parts form what is called the Bizcali, and they are snatched up by the best man in one hand, a lighted torch being held in the other. He runs away, and is pursued, being captured at length by two of the friends, and these three their roast and eat the bizcali, what is left over all any -being taken back.

As the child grows up, he or she has to be instructed in the duties of the adult so that the abnormal children are, or were, exposed. Among the Hausas the first-born of every woman was put to death, and apparent survivals of such a custom are traceable in the case of the Hausa mother, who will not allow her hir band to see her suckling her first child (called her "shaine"), and perhaps also in that of the Filam, where the eldest has to live with his mother's people.

With ra. Hansas and other Muhammadans the woman remains in t, but for a week, her teniale friends visiting and congratulating her, but on the eighth day, the Malams, or priests, and relatives are assembled, and kola mits (the great ceremoral present, corresponding in its uses somewhat to our champagne) are given to all. A special dish, consisting of coin, oil, etc., is prepared, and perhaps a rain, or even a bull, is killed, and eaten, the undwives taking the head, legs and skin, while the officiating malam takes the saddle. After the child has had its community may gain the services of another useful member of society, the training of the male children being usually more severe, as is only natural. In the case of girls, the education is mostly concerned with marriage, and will best be considered under that heading With boys, there is usually some religious element. The Head-Hunters assemble their youths at about the age of ten, amidst drumming and blowing of horns, each candidate being smeared all over with The grown-up men present (who have been drinking grease after having been shaved clean beer so as to make them feel really religious) then beat the youths until they (the men) are tired. Then the chief priest gives the boys certain information, and wains them to keep away from women until the ceremonies have been completed, and, after having been given switches with which to drive away any women who may come near them, the candidates are taken to the sacred

They must not speak to a woman for another week, however, but after that they are full members of the tribe, though at one time it is probable that they had to take a head before being regarded as men. Beating takes place amongst the Bambaras also.

The pagan Hausas, or Magazawa, used to shut up their children in an enclosure for a month to instruct them in the love of their totens and in the spirit rites and dances. The Ibos believe that an ancestor can be reincarnated in more than one child, either a lineal descendant or a member of the family of a brother or sister. Children may have come even from the world of the mother's ancestors. Naturally the parents wish to know who the child is, if it be an ancestor, so they call in a medicine-man and make an ancestral image of oglisi wood. The medicineman discovers from which world the child has come, and mentions what animals are forbidden to it, and two calabashes with water, cotton-tree leaves, cam-wood and a palin-leaf having been provided, the body of the child is touched with the mixture, while the words, "May the child not come from the world of sickness," are spoken, and a fowl is killed. Objects are then thrown on the road, and small children may pick them up. But the image is kept for the child, who calls it his chi. Some children come from the flose, or even the tree world, in the former case reincarnation, being a matter of choice. A tree child is connected with some particular tree which is indicated by the medicine-man, and it must never be cut down until a sacrifice of chalk, seed-vam, and a pot has been made, otherwise the child will die. Many men are single because they cannot afford to pay for a bride—but poverty is another object of ridicule amongst natives. When a Head-Hunter goes to propose, he ornaments himself by painting his face and wearing a long non-chain round his neck, and takes a present of money to the father of the fair one. If his sint is accepted, he adds a hoe, a goat, a dog, and the flesh of another goat which he and the father eat. With the Hausas, the youth first asks the girl—for although Muhammadans, the women are not seeluded—and if she is willing he gets his best friend to approach his father or uncle, who then sounds the girl's father or uncle. In some parts an old woman may act as an intermediary; such a person is nearly always employed to carry less honourable proposals. If all are willing, a part of the dower is paid, and on the fourth day before the wedding, the bride-to-be is seized by her female relatives and bridesmaids, who stain her hands and feet with henna, the girl resisting—or pretending to do so. She is kept in the stains for four days, and is then taken to her husband's house at might. He, however, is not there, he has to live with the best man for some days—varying from two to seven. At the end of the time, the best man brings him to his house, Amongst women of the Hausa States of Northern Nigeria the hair is done up into a stiff ridge upon a frame of fibre, and may not be taken down again for some weeks or ever months, the ejection being useful as a receptacle for coins and cowrie shells. On page 812 a photograph appears of a woman carrying a water jai on her head, showing the device by which the head-dress is protected.

and, having given presents to the bridesmaids still with her and thus bribed them to go away, the best man tries to make the bride speak. She will not do so, and he also retires, leaving her and her husband alone The name of the first husband is never spoken by a Hausa wife, she calls him owner of the house or something similar, for the real name is a vulnerable point of attack if used by an exilly disposed wife

In certain parts of north west Nigeria, the parents stand outside the house when the budggroom enters, and two friends of his hold the gul's legs. It the bride is a viigin, a white cloth with the usual signs is exhibited to the parents and presents are brought If, however, she is not a viigin, the linsband creets a pole in front of his hut, breaks her dishes and pots, and hangs them upon it. This is done in order to make the gul wish to leave, for if she goes of her own free will, her parents must return the marriage fee, but they keep it if the husband drives her away

Amongst the Kukuruku of Semolika, girls are all married at the same time of the year, and instead of being taken to their new home by members of their own family, they are brought by relatives of the husband. The men of Arguingu must serve on the farms of their parents in law elect for some years, until the girls are ready for marriage, and must give annual presents in addition. This is the case with the Ibo also, and with other tribes. At marriage, the bride is smeared with henna for seven days, the bridegroom for four, and she is taken to his house by the best main.

With the Filam, at the end of the year a rite called Grewali is held in the forest. The youths stand in line, and, the girls having picked out their favourites, all the couples sleep together after having had a feast. On marriage, a girl is given a white cock by her husband, and after she has released it, it is sacred. The nomad Filam does not bring his write to his house until after two years of marriage. The Sobo husband does not strictly live with his write's people. He visits her every evening at her fathers house, leaving again at daybreak, for about three months, and then the gul is taken to his house by members of her family

With the Bassa-Komo, all the men may have to live in one part of the village, all the women in another, the husbands visiting their wives, or the wives their husbands, as occasions permit. Amongst the 'Mbres of Lake Chad there is group marriage, but the husbands must. If be brothers, and the wives sisters.

An Ekoralso must work on the larms of the parents of the maiden or his choice for two or three years, and must give the presents of palm oil, plantams stried meat, turn and tobacco. The binding ceremony of marriage consists in the acceptance is acceptance is proclaimed throughout the village by the sincor a wise precaution, for the frail fair one may have taken gifts from other sintors also. Indeed, West Mircan marriage being a business affair, a purchase it is very mach of a ramble in every stage.

Before the marriage feast the gul should spend some time in the "Fatting House," and while there she does not go out or de any work. Only not able to do this a neithrough lack of finide or for other reasons, are looked down upon, and should the mother not approve of her prospective somenlaw, she can sometimes male him break the engagement by threatening to stiff her daughter during this important per (2) and if the gul leaves the Fatterg House she is smeared from the warst down with a red dve, and her face (2) painted in carous colours, while she wears special cloths and ornaments, and her han is decorated with feathers. Dancing and leasting are indulged in, and later on she goes to her finishand, who sit he is wise, will make her swear on the Juju of confinence to keep faitfull to Juni.

On the Gold Coa t, when a gul arrives at the age of publify she is taken to the water side, and washed by other guis, and an offering of boiled mashed yain and palm-oil is made upon the banks

In Liberia the aboriginal girl must pass through a bush school much resembling that of the Bundu in Sieria Leone, and to a less extent the Fatting House of Southern Nigeria , and when she is ready for marriage, her prospective husband is advised. He has probably bespoken her in early youth, and so has saved up his presents in anticipation of the great day, and he now brings the bude-price (which is about equal to one cow, two slaves, and a number of kola-nuts), or perhaps only a part, the rest being paid later in instalments, on proof of the satisfactory quality of the goods. The bride's family has already been propitiated by guns for the brothers, and cloths for the sisters, and household intensils or cloths for the mother The bride is rubbed all over with a poniade made of animal fat and palm-oil, and having been decked in special ornaments supposed to possess some magic properties, she is taken to the bridegroom's house, where a feast is being held. In Western Liberia the mother accompanies her to ask the husband later on it all is well, and, if not, the assembly breaks up in confusion, the families immediately proceeding to quarrel about the return of the purchase money as guls are allowed official lovers nowadays before marriage, it is not good form for the husband to make any fuss on finding out something which any sensible Liberian would have expected

A Bambara gul is usually betrothed between the ages of four and ten, the consent of the parents being dependent upon the result of an interview with their bolt, or family spirits. The suitor must give presents to the father then, and to the gul later. When the time for the marriage approaches he gives her presents, while her father provides a dowry this differentiating the custom from that observed elsewhere in West Africa With some families the gul passes one night with the suitor about a fortinght before the marriage day, but this is not universal. On the night of the real marriage she is taken to her new home by youths and girls, friends of the budegroom and of the bride, amidst dancing, singing and the firing of guns. While she is on her way, the priest brings the bolt and puts it upon the bed which she is soon to occupy, so as to exorcize all evil spirits, but on her arrival he takes his departure. The bridesmaids let down the bride's hair, remove her chastity apron and bathe her, and ther lead her to her husband's hut. After some time both emerge, and the guests, having been assured of the bride's vugnity, she goes to a friend's hut to sleep while the bridegroom and his friends get gloriously clinik, the leasting going on for as long as he can afford it

With some families the bride may not leave her new home for eight days, after which she spends fifteen with her parents, then returning home, and later on paying two more visits to lier family, consisting of four days and one night respectively But many families do not observe this custom Every bride gives a special exhibition of her tronssean in her new home, and when it is par ticularly splendid her triends parade the articles around the town, showing them teach house with the landable ideas of magnifying the position of the bride and of causing envy amongst any rivals

Many of these borr are disease spirits, possibly introduced by Arabs, such as Yerima (lever) and the Yayan Zanranna (who give smallpox and other complaints), many are old pagain deities, whose worship is still retained, the chief of the latter being Magirro and Uwar Gaona (corn deities), Mar-Ia-Chikki (a snake), and Kurr and his wife Uwar Dowa, the rulers of the forest. In Nigeria the rites—in which people imagine themselves possessed by these and other spirits, have been forbidden by the Government, but they still flourish further to the north, and even along the Benne natives of other tribes have learned them. It is said that Allah is above all, and that the borr can do nothing without his permission, but I was rather amused to find that in North Africa the Hausa ex-slaves were encouraged to maintain their rites, for the Arabs admitted that although prayers to Allah for rain were only moderately successful, those offered by the negroes to their borr were never known to fail!

properties of many of the forest plants, but to suppose that they would not take advantage of their reputation is hardly reasonable, and some hypnotize their clients. Thus, when a Hansa youth wished to become a boka, or medicine man, he had to accost headless pinus or borr without fear, the idea that he had really met these spirits being due doubtless to mesmeric influence. For a supernatural visitation is required a supernatural cure, and amongst the Hansas, when a person is ill, the boka himself affects to be possessed by a spirit who will tell him the cause of the complaint and the means by which to remedy it. In other parts, the complaint is generally attributed to witcheraft, and since human beings cannot decide such a question, supernatural agencies must, so the accused is put to the ordeal, which in West Africa usually has the form of a poisonous draught. If the accused with suspicion, and is banished from the village, but if death is evidently approaching, the desired end is often hastened by the medicine-men—theoretically because they are carrying out the behests of the spirits, practically because the accused has not paid them a sufficient amount

In connection with the cult of lke, there is a method of discovering stolen goods which to some extent resembles an ordeal. A dish is taken in which are placed a small bowl with cowries and other emblems of lke. A girl then puts the dish upon her head, and walks about the town, accompanied by the owner of the lost property, who rings it singing, "The one who took my fowl, if he does not bring it back, may the gods kill him."

In most parts of Southern Nigeria the Government has managed to put an end to ordeals. Before this, when an Edo was suspected, he had to allow a priest to pass a fowl's feather half way through his (the suspect's) tongue, saving as he did it, that if guilty it would stick in the tongue, if

The musicians first enter the ring and soon the world strains attract people from all parts, men women and children gradually and the sound of the s

Sometimes each family would send a representative to undergo this ordeal, and the guilty person night thus never be tested. Amongst the Ninzam of Northern Nigeria the chief may have a fowl as his deputy to undergo the ordeal of drinking galaska, and if it dies he is guilty.

At Nibo a medicine-man can see a witch at might, and he draws a circle, thus imprisoning her until daylight, when she is seen in the form of a vulture and can be killed. This is not a real vulture, of course, but her heart, and if the bird is killed her body lying senseless at home dies too.

The detection and punishment of wizards and witches is often left to certain castes of medicine-men, indeed, they are the only persons who can "smell out" these evil-doers. Thus

When a Head-Hunter is very ill, his soul leaves its bodily casing, and travels to wards the stream which divides this world from the next, and if the ghosts of the departed ancestors on the other side think that it is time for the person to die, the soul is allowed to cross, but if not, they drive it back to the body, and the sick man recovers Sometimes there is a delay, the ghosts being iniable to come to a decision, and in this case the soul, being without a habita tion, shrinks so much, that if in the end it should be compelled to return to the body, the person will feel the effects, and although he recovers, he will not have the full use of his limbs, perhaps, or he will find that his brain has become affected But if the ghosts decide that the patient has hved long enough, the soul is allowed to cross over the bridge, and it can then never return to that particular body, which must die. The grave, which is in the shape of a tantalus-bottle, is dug close to the thatch, and after all the

The body is first placed upon the ground, and the chief priest wishes the soul good link in the spirit world, at the same time expressing a pions hope that the relatives left alive will keep well a limit to the ghost not to worry them. After the corpse has been placed in the grave, the mouth is covered by a flat stone and clay, and the excavated earth is heaped up on top.— If the deceased has been an important person, a goat will be killed at the graveside, if unimportant, a fowl, if a baby, probably nothing, and in all cases branches of two trees

After the corpse has been washed, it is placed in a coffin lined with new cloths, and furnished with a pillow for the head, feet, and for each elbow, and the hands are folded upon the breast. Animals (e.g., a cow and a goat) are sacrificed, and the coffin is lowered into a grave some six feet deep dug in one of the huts. After the grave has been filled in, various dances take place, and a portion of the sacrificial meat and drink having been offered to the ancestors, the rest is divided amongst the assembled monniers, a wake being held for several days, or even weeks afterwards. When a stranger dies, he is buried in the road by which he entered the town, so that his spirit may find the way back to his own village without trouble—or at any rate, be able to watch for the coming of friends.

After a day or two, the body is taken out of the house through a hole which has been specially made in the wall, and having been placed in a trench-like grave, lowls, sheep,

The wake used to go on as long as the family could afford it, but nowadays the people are more economical, and also they do not now put gold and other valuables in the coffins, as was once the case.

When it has been impossible to recover the body, a miniature coffin is made and covered with a white cloth. If the person has been drowned, the coffin is carried to the seashore, and after a little rum has been sprinkled upon the waves, and the deceased has been summoned thrice, some sand and sea-water are poured into the coffin, and it is buried. If the person has been burned, some of his ashes or those of the house, or a little soil from the vicinity, will be placed in the coffin. In each case the mourners cry out that the deceased has been sought and not found, so that the ghost will not think the relatives have been neglectful, and punish them in consequence.

Towards the end of August a festival is held for the general remembrance of the dead, and from early morning the people wail for those who have died during the past two years. Then each family goes to its own graves and makes offerings of fowls, eggs, rum and palin-wine, flattering the deceased, and calling upon them for protection. After this, there is feasing for seven days, and on the minth morning the common utensils used during the festival are thrown away, new ones being substituted.

It is said that these "souls" did not try to avoid their fate, believing that they would emoy a similar status in the next world to that which they had held duimg life. On each anniversary of the King's death, fresh attendants were despatched to join him to show that he had not been forgotten, and to give further proof of his greatness to the inhabitants of the world which he was then honoring with his presence

The family of any deceased person, except a slave, howls continuously for a fortinglit, the remainder of the fellow-citizens for two days. The body of a slave is thrown into the bush without ceremony, and allowed to rot there, but if the deceased was free, the corpse is exposed to view for some days, until too far gone to be any longer bearable, in fact. It is then sewn up in a mat, and after having been laid in the grave, a quantity of cloth, varying in proportion to the wealth of the deceased, special personal intensits, such as a pipe, and some trade goods, are placed on top, and soaked with libations of ruin, trade-gin, or palmi-wine, both as an offering to the manes and also so as to render the cloths useless and no temptation to a third. One of the Ibo chiefs, the King of Aguku, is the spiritual potentate over a large extent of the country, and is regarded with great awe by the populace. He is dressed in a long blue gown, and on his head is a tall cowhide cap surrounded by eagles' feathers. He rarely leaves his own town after his first year of kingship, but when he does so, he is always accompanied by a servant who carries a small bell. If the chief meets anyone upon the road whom he wishes to salute, he takes the bell and strikes two notes upon it. In his own house, or in the town of Aguku, a large single bell is used, and when the king strikes this, all the people present clap their hands. When he is dying, a man from a certain district touches his face with a sacred object, ofo, which is then put away in the sleeping mat of the departing king, and is kept there intil the successor (not necessarily a relative) sends to the dead man's son for permission to remove it. CHAPTER XXXII

NORTH AFRICA By MARY TREMEARNE, L.L.A

WE know from the old Roman writers that the inhabitants of the countries along the southern shores of the Mediterraneau were once tribes of wild savages which differed widely from each other in culture. But owing to successive white colonizing powers, and to the fanatical prohibitions of Islam, there is now a certain similarity in most of the customs all along the coast, though distinct survivals still exist of the native African rites. In some parts, indeed, pagair customs have been imported from West Africa, and the negro existance are encouraged to keep them up, for the Arabs are finally convinced of the efficacy of the magic of the blacks. (See illustration on page 841)

Owing to the prevailing religion, and in all probability partly because of the shelterless nature of the country, the inhabitants of North Mrica arc, on the ave age, much more clothed than those of other parts of the continent. The Arab men still keep their native dress, the poorer men went the hood of the tobe over their fez as an extra protection, the richer ones wear a turban which almost entirely eclipses the fez. A bernous is worn for greater warmth or to show the weater's position in life. There is nothing much to mark off the few from the Arab, as he is no longer the victim of simptuary laws, and the younger men dress for the most part like Europeans. Arabs from the interior wear the rope turbans. The Bedawin are generally rather dirty. Then women are never veiled, and their garment of two pieces of coarse material is usually blue. Each woman wears a profusion of chains in the hair and on the breast, and she secures her garments with fibulæ upon the shoulders.

The Jewish costume for women consists of a pair of more or less elaborate trousers and a longsleeved striped stockmette vest worn under a zonave jacket. In the case of some in Thins, who claim to be descended from the original colony which came over in the days of Solomon, a very curious, heavily-gilded peaked cap is worn, over which the shroud-like shawl is drawn

Children are much desired, a childless woman is regarded with pity or contempt, and a widow who has had no offspring makes every effort to obtain another husband. Nor does she trust to her own attractions alone, there are any number of charms and amulets which will help her to obtain her desire. The majority consist of magic formulas, verses of the Koran, or a combination of letters

A MUHAMMADAN PROCESSION IN TUNIS

The birthday of the Prophet Muhammad is kept as a day of general rejoicing in all Muhammadan countries. Processions headed by the leading families of the place march to the mosques, where special services are held, and banners which have been carried to Mecca are taken through the streets and figures from it, and these talismans are particularly efficacious if written upon gazelle skin with a sprig of myrtle in mk made from saffron and rosewater, the whole being enclosed in steel. The myrtle owes its influence to the fact that it was brought down from heaven by Adam, and iron is supposed to prevent all leakage of baraka, or power

Pilgrimages are made to some shrine, especially if the woman has had children before and has lost them, and while votive offerings of money will be handed to the custodian for the purchase of candles and food, little strips of cloth may be fied to a special free at the sacred spot

In some parts on the seventh day after the buth, the child and the mother receive the guests who come to wish them happiness. The baby is taken all round the house in the case of the rich, the poorer families live in one room, and the Belawin, of course, live in tents. Various noises are made to accustom the child to the bustle of life upon which he will presently enter. A diminive in the shape of a carafe, or gula, is adorned with the most beautiful jewels which can be borrowed from all and sundry for the occasion, so that the baby may be rich, and salt is sprinkled on mother and child to ward off the exil eye. It is a preservative against the Jimus

When girls are about seven years of age then hands are stained with henna, then han is greased and tightly bound up into a pigtail, and they are henceforth yeiled. The boys must imdergo a certain rite necessary to all Muhammadans, and on both these occasions feasts and dances are held.

Although the Arab women of the cities are veiled, and are never supposed to be seen by any men except those belonging to their own circle of relatives, there are a number of charms for awakening love on the part of either sex. And there are bad as well as good charms. If a young girl is going to be married to a man to whom the mother or some other person takes an objection, that interested person will take some of the water in which a dead body has been washed, and will throw it over the girl. Differences between the engaged parties will at once arise, and the engagement will probably be broken off without delay. But if the girl's family as a whole, is anxious for the marriage to take place, special means will be taken to break the spell. The girl must go to the seashore, and entering the water quite inde, dip in seven successive waves, drinking a little of the water of each. She must not speak a single word during the performance of the whole rite, which is rendered all the more effications if she carries the implement with which a grave has been dig. A mixture of disagreeable scents is their burned and sprinkled over her

THE DANSE DUA FNIRI

This dance is exceedingly popular with the native audiences but it is anythin, but graceful to the European eye Professional dancers are engaged to give exhibitions at weddynss and upon other festive occasions.

On the wedding-day the bride is taken by her bridesmaids to the bath, where they wash her and adoin her in new ramient. On her way she is sprinkled by other women with holy water as a symbol of fertility. The actual marriage festivities last usually about three days, the middle evening being the most important for the bride, as the heinia feast generally takes place then. The public wedding breakfasts: if such they may be called sare celebrated separately by bride and bridegroom, the latter entertaining or being entertained, by his friends in a different house, and in spite of Islamic prohibitions a state of intoxication inpon this and other festive occasions seems to be the usual finish desired. The bride has various more or less beautiful garments in her trouseaut, supposed to be for wear on the different festivals connected with her marriage, but though she may possess a goigeous pair of new heavily gold-embroidered white satin trousers and bodice, the costume worn is often lined or borrowed, together with all the jewellery available in the neighbourhood. The bridegroom's gifts are supposed to include a diamond (Arab) ring, a bracelet, and a brooch for the head-doess.

On the night of the heima feast when the assembled guests have supped on the special dainties provided for them, they are probably entertained by an exhibition of the danse du-rentre, which consists of a number of contortions and convulsive tremors of the torso, to the accompaniment provided by a band of female or of blind male musicians (see illustration on this page). The latter are the only men admitted to the harem under ordinary circumstances, necessary exceptions being made sometimes in the case of doctor and dentist. The musicians play and sing also at intervals, and the songs are mostly of an obscene character.

The bride and her attendants are not present at the feast, occasionally there are men among the guests, she does not come down until they have withdrawn. But during the whole of the three days the bride sits upon a high raised wooden stool or chair, with her feet upon her bridal coffer, which may be merely a gilded and painted box or a silver casket containing jewels. She must neither (unle nor move, but sit quite rigid, with a hand flat upon each knee). The hermal woman is nearly always very late, for many marriages being planned to take place at the same time, her services are much in request, and occasionally the head servant undertakes the office. She brings a big basket with the hermal in it, and two embroidered bags in which the hands are to be wrapped for the might, and putting the leaves in her mouth, she chews them up to make a paste, meantime inviting the onlookers to throw offerings for the bride into the basket. If any particular offering is considered too small, the name of the donor may be mentioned, in order to shame

The bride's hands are then stained diagonally across the palms, from the base of the thumb to the base of the fourth linger, and over the linger tips to below the first joint—the edges being ornamentally finished with points or curves—The hands are then very tightly bandaged, and put into the bags.—Some skins take the stain very much more readily than others, and frequently the guests wait till the bandages are removed—In the meanting, a veil is put upon the bride, and she is escorted to her chamber for the might, or till her hands shall be sufficiently stained—Some girls have then hands stained previously, so that they do not need to remain in the bandages for

THE SPIRIT CULT OF THE NEGROES

In Tripoli, Lunis, and elsewhere are colonies from West Africa composed of Hausas and others who maintain bor (spirit) dancing and other magical rites. In the above, a woman is possessed by a bush spirit or Jinn called Jogust.

so long on the actual day Henna is smeared upon the soles of the feet, the face also, and upon the edges of the skull in some cases, making it appear as if the han had been shaved for an inch all round A European coat and skirt is now considered by many to be an indispensable item of the trousseau, although it does not necessarily follow that they will ever be worn

With the Jews of Tims and elsewhere, as soon as a girl reaches the marriageable age of thiteen or fourteen she is shift up and fattened on

The marriage ceremony is quite different from that of the Arabs and it may take place in the synagogne or in a bedroom The arrival of the bridegroom is greeted by the women with the peculiar cry, or Kururua, and he is ushered in to take his place on the left-hand side of the bride. The bridegroom wraps a silk scarf round his hat and lets it hang down like a pugaree, and, standing side by side among their relatives, the two are blessed and prayed over by a Rabbi, and their hands are joined by him and rings are exchanged The Rabbi then holds a glass of wine in one hand, the other being raised over their heads while reciting a prayer, and when he has sipped the wine he offers it to the bridegroom, who, in turn, offers it to his bride. The glass is then smashed with a great deal of noise. Wine is handed in small glasses to the immediate friends, and sweets are passed upon a tray to the general company, who help themselves.

In Morocco, a woman who thinks that her husband's affection is vaning lets honey run down her face from her torchead to her chin, catching it there in a spoon. Then she pincks her tongue with a fig-leaf, and having mixed with the blood which comes seven grains of salt, she pits it into the spoon with the honey.—She then pincks herself between the evelvows, letting the blood trickle down into the spoon and mix with another seven grains of salt.—She then mixes this with as much earth from three of her footprints as will cover three silver coins, and puts it into her husband's food.—After that, his affections are rekindled, and happiness again reigns supreme.

In the above, one of the dancers imagines himself to be possessed by Mai Aska, the Jian or here who is barber to the city of the Jians, and he goes through the actions of shaving the others. The man in the centre is wearing a Hausa woman's head diess the insignal of a medicine man.

Although the Arab professes to put his whole trust in Allah, his religion is anything but a comfortable one, for he is always in terror that some Jinn has marked him down for destruction, or that a fellow man has cursed him with the evil eye. For this reason he covers himself with talismans formed of verses or magic letters or figures from the Koran, and with various charms in the shape of a fish, the human hand, a key, a sword, a crescent, coins, and he is not above adopting anything found useful elsewhere, for even horse-shoes are hung above his door

In all directions in Timis can be seen the sign of the hand (see illustration on this page). It is painted in black or red above almost every door, smeared with henna upon animals, or with blood upon the instruments used in certain religious festivals, and it is worn in silver as an ornament round the necks of many of the presumed tan ones of the country. The crevices in the walls of many of the buildings are filled in with paper upon which verses of the Koran have been written.

A PROTECTION AGAINST MISTORTUNE

Many of the houses in Tunis have a hand painted or daubed above the doorway as a protection against the cyclese and in the crevices of the walls are stuffed pieces of paper upon which mayer formula base been written resorted to in case of the failure of the petition. In Timis and Tripoli the Hausa colonies of exslaves from West Africa are encouraged to practise their rites openly, and when necessary they proceed to a hill in the vicinity and by means of a sacrifice to the bori, or spirits, and various dances—in some of which they think themselves possessed—the ram is brought without delay. In other parts of North Africa the Arabs and Moors trust to their own local rites.

One of the most interesting of the rites is that of Ghonja (a water ladle), practised over a wide stretch of country in the Maghrib. When a drought has begun, a ladle is dressed up like a doll, and taken in procession through the streets, while the old women and children sing, "Ghonja has sometimes such pieces of paper are also mixed with the mortal

The Arabs being so deeply immersed in superstition, it is only to be expected that fortunetellers and crystal gazers should be much sought after in North Africa The fortunes are told by making patterns in a small heap of sand, by counting beans, or by writing Haruspication and other methods of divination are also common. The Christian and the Icw are strange to the Arab, and are credited with evil powers, so to meet either first thing in the morning is a very bad omen Black generally is a bad omen, so an Arab would not care to meet even a Muhammadan negro, and blackbirds are worse. White is naturally the converse, so a maiden carrying milk is very welcome

Since the Arabs have devastated the South Mediterranean countries and have helped to turn what was once the granary of the known world into a sandy waste, the rainfall is a very important subject. The Muhammadan way is to proceed in procession with flags flying and missic sounding to some selected spot, and there pray to Allah, but usually magic rites are

Their dress is quite different from that worn by the ladies of the cities, as the latter are forced to be veiled and swaddled until no part of the figure can be distinguished.

bared his head, give him drink, O'Master, give us rain," or something similar. Water is thrown upon it, and upon the performers. Thus Ghonja becomes almost a goddess of rain

When an Arab is seriously ill, the holy man is sent for to see what can be done. The dying man is bidden to confess and say the all powerful formula expressing the unity of God and the mission of Muliammad, which is practically all that is necessary for his salvation. A fowl is then obtained and its throat is cut. Then a little boy is chosen to run for a certain distance in a particular direction, taking the fowl with him. If he does not meet anyone it is a sign that the sick man will recover, but should he be sufficiently unfortunate as to do so after everyone in the neighbourhood has been warned to keep out of his way, it is Kismet and the Will of Allah.

When a male Moslem dies his future life is assured, so he has no need to be auxious, his condition will be one of idle hixuriousness, and the wives who have worked themselves ugly and old before their time for him in this world will be replaced by young hours of surpassing beauty. The deceased is washed, robed in white and carried to the grave—perhaps in a kind of crate upon the back of a donkey—where he is builed in a trench with his face towards the east. The Beys and their families are builed in a special manisoleum, for the other people there is a recognized cemetery A slab of marble, or of bricks cemented together and whitewashed, is placed over the grave, with certain erections representing a turban and fez in the case of a man and there is always a hole somewhere near the centre. In this hole are placed offerings of bread and water, so that the ghost may know that the deceased has not been forgotten, but it does not cat them

CHAPTER XXXIII

EAST AFRICA AND UGANDA By CAPTAIN C. H. STIGAND, F.R.G.S., F.R.A.L.

INTRODUCTORY

The people contained in this section are those living in British East Africa, Uganda and German East Africa. These may be roughly divided into groups or elements as follows *

- (I) Pigmv, who, with the Hottentot and Bushman of the south, are thought to be the original inhabitants of tropical Africa, or at any rate the earliest arrivals in the continent. At the present day they are practically restricted to the Congo forest.
- (II) Sudanese Acgroes A dark-skinned negro type, more particularly belonging to the Western Sudan and alhed to the negroes of the west coast Representatives of this type extend to the Nile in the Madi and Lendu
- (III.) Natoric Negrocs—Also of dark skin and generally tall and thin-legged. The Barr, Kavirondo (or Jaho), and Acholi belong to this group, a mixture of Nilotic people, and the next group, Hamitic people, have probably been the origin of such types as Masar, Nandi, Turkana, Latuka and Suk.
 - (IV.) Hamitic people, such as Somali and Galla. The Hamitic stock of Ancient Egypt probably spread far southwards, and seem to have left the stamp of their Cancasian features on most of the tribes to the north of British East Africa and Uganda and many still farther south

(V) Bantu people —This is perhaps a distinction of language rather than type, and so would include the Manyema and Bahima, as well as the Baganda, Banyoro, Kiknyu, Northern Kavnondo, Wanyika, Wanyamwezi, and many others. It would also include the Swahih, a people resulting from the mixture of many African tribes with a small proportion of Arab, Portuguese and Persian blood (See map on page 727)

It must be remembered that most of these peoples are so mextricably mixed up and graduate so one into the other that it is difficult or impossible to divide them up into arbi-The groups reasons which have caused this fusion are chiefly the custom of aduniting prisoners of war into a tube, slave-raiding, the practice of exogamy, and tamme and drought, which often force natives to seek refuge amongst other peoples

These same causes have tended to mix up various customs, and so it is often impossible to say if a certain custom is characteristic of a tribe or has been imported into it. I will now try to mention some of the peculiarities of diess roughly characteristic of the above groups

hung round the neck. This is for warmth and is swing round to face the direction of rain or wind. Curious patterns of spots or stripes are burnt on these skins, so that they resemble, at a distance, those of leopards or tigers (see illustration on page 848). Elderly women wear a kind of tassel or tail of string, hanging from a belt round the waist. If a rian of the tribe, even the husband, touches this tail, a goat mist be sacrificed, or, it is thought, the woman would get seriously ill and perhaps die. The waist-belt supporting this tail is composed of beads and cowrieshells. Almost all African women wear a belt of beads. Sometimes, as with the Kikuyu girls, they are very ornate, consisting of many rows of coloured beads in patterns (see illustration on

The Kikuyu are a powerful tribe occupying many hundreds of square miles of the highlands of British Fast Africa. Many of them are exceedingly rich in cattle, sheep and goats. The crops are cultivated by the women, who can carry enormous loads suspended by a broad leather band passing round the forehead.

When they adopt clothes, the bead warst-belt is retained, although it may be reduced page 85 () in breadth Even a well diesed woman, like a Swahih, wears a string, with a few beads attached, round her warst and under her clothes

The women of other tribes, such as Masai, Kikuyu, Nandi and Turkana, are generally well

KAVIRONDO DRESS

The Kavirondo sometimes wear a goat-skin for warmth. This is hung from the neck and swung round to lace the rain or wind Currous patterns are burnt on these skins, so that at a distance they resemble those of kopards or tigers women and girls wear many coils round arms, legs, and neck, and the former even wear heavy coils attached to the pierced and distended lobes of the ear (see illustration on page 846). Horseshoeshaped car ornaments are beaten out of brass wire and used by Masai old men. Further north, amongst the Turkana and Suk, non-wire is more in demand and used much in the same way. The warriors of these tribes frequently wear a collar of iron wire, as do the Masai occasionally (see dressed in tanned skins, although one breast is often left exposed. The skins worn in front and behind are separate, they overlap when at rest, but in walking show the leg. The men of these tribes live in complete nuclity or wear a goat-skin hing round the neck, as with the Kaynondo - These skins are worn with the hair on, but the skins which the women wear are tanned and hanless Elders sometimes have a long robe of hyrax skins, trimined with a border of small beads. This is an emblem of rank, and also used to wrap round the body on a cold night

The Bantu has in many places adopted clothing of the Zanzibai type, viz., for men, a lour-cloth, either of Maskat make or of patterned caheo Above this he may wear either a vest or the sleeveless jacket called kisibao, or the long Arab shirt called khamis. or a combination of two or more of these and a fez On the coast he may wear also a coat of European manufacture

The Baganda men have adopted much the same dress except that they wear cotton trousers or drawers, like the Abyssmians. Inland, where he is unable to afford these clothes, the Bantu contents himself with a loin-cloth of plain white or blue coarse calico In places where he has been unable to obtain even this, he is generally met with well diessed in bark-cloth Women usually wear long cotton robes of the Zanzıbar type wrapped round the body and fastened under the armpit. On the coast, two of these, of similar pattern, are worn together, the second being thrown over the head, worn as a shawl or round the waist The better-class coast women dress in more style, either in Arab dress or in trousers.

In the countries under review brass wire is largely used for ornamental purposes. Masai illustration on page 858) The wire is generally traded, but some people, as the Karamojo, are able to make their own of roughly smelted iron Amongst the Turkana Kaynondo, Karamoto. Acholi and Madi a number of holes are pierced round the run of the ear, and in each of these a small brass ting is worn Kikiiyii do the same, only the imps are strung with beads Only married women wear these, and the multitude of bead bangles attached to the lobe, whilst young piece—These, called majasi, are made of gold as worn by the higher-class women—The higher-class Swahili women wear a gold stud, called shahasi, in a hole bored through the right nostril—Ivory is used largely by the Madi, Barr and Lugware as bracelets and armlets for the men—The Suk pierce the lower lip and insert a brass rod or porcupine quill

There is a curious belt worn by the Jaluo and Kisii. This is made of iron beads, about the size of hazel-nuts, strung on leather. Several rows are often worn, each row has the purchasing value of one heifer.

Many of the naked Nilotic peoples are fond of smearing the body over with pigment. The Masar and Kikuvu pour fat, mixed with a red earth found in the country of the latter, over head and shoulders. Sometimes it is smeared all over the body. The Kavirondo and Acholi paint the body with a kind of red ochre. The former sometimes paint white stockings on their legs with a white clay and the Sirk smear this over face and body.

ВІКІН, СПП БПООБ ДХБ ДОРТИ

Life African baby does not make its entry into the world under very favourable auspices often as not the mother is working in the fields, under a hot sun, up to the moment of its buth It is often born in the open, indeed, with the Baganda it is thought necessary to take mother out of doors for this event. The first sensation that the newly-born child feels is that of being washed in cold water. The Masar spit on a baby for luck, spitting by them denotes respect, friendliness, and is used as a charm against evil magic The husband also kills an ox or slicep for the mother. according to his means and whether it is a boy or girl The woman is almost always responsible for all the cultivation of the household, the mother camiot leave her baby in the house, so takes it with her to the fields. The coast native places the child on her back and draws her upper cotton robe round herself and the baby. She then fastens or knots the ends of the robe over her chest. Flattened like a frog against its mother's back, with head turned to one side, the newly-born baby is often carried for hours under a tropical sun, whilst the mother tills and weeds the fields. Many inland people, especially those that live naked, have a kind of hold-all of skin, into which the baby is put and strapped on the back. Amongst the Lendu the baby is provided with a basket-work cone, which fits into the skin hold-all and forms a roof for the head, but this is exceptional. The Masai and Kikuyu generally stuff their babies into the back of their skin robes, which are then field tightly over the chest. Some Kikuyu

Kavirondo men, women and children go about, as a rule, stark naked, but the men frequently adoin their heads with circlets of ivory or with ostrich plumes. Some construct for important occasions hats of basket work, which are plastered with clay and ornamented with feathers and other trophics, sometimes six feet in height.

women, however, are provided with the hold-all (See illustration on page 855.)

Baganda women, whilst working, usually leave their babies at the side of the fields, lying on a piece of bark-cloth and with a little shelter of leaves creeted over them

Owing to exposure and want of care the mortality amongst infants is great, whilst some tribes actually practise infanticide. The Borana and Kerie, of the Omo river, kill the first-born as a matter of custom. With the latter it is strangled and thrown into the river to be eaten by crocodiles. The Basikuma leave children, born under certain supposedly-mauspicious circumstances, to die from exposure.

To the superstitions African the advent of twins, being a rare event, is considered either very good or bad luck, in any case it is thought advisable to propriate the spirits. With many people the medicine-man is immediately sent for, and lie sets to work to make sintable chaims, to preserve father, mother, or infants from evil

All children, even those of well-dressed peoples, are usually allowed to spend the first six or seven years of their lives naked, except for an anulet, wood or bead chaim, fastened round arm, ankle or warst. It is thought that exil spirits have less power over a naked child, especially if it wears a charm.

Small children seldom seem to take much enjoyment in life, or frolic or play games. At a very early age they have to start such work as herding goats and carrying water. With a few tribes, however, it is different. The Masai little ones enjoy life immensely, they play at building liuts, keeping house, making mud pies and other games. The coast children often make dolls out of pumpkins or buildies of rags, while children of other tribes practise shooting with miniature bows and arrows.

Amongst certain tribes some of the front teeth are extracted while the cluld is still young. They are levered out with an iron instrument and, is a rule, a special man is called in to do that. In Uganda parents often send their children away to be brought up by their relatives. Numbers are also presented to the different kings and chiefs.

On reaching puberty both boys and girls have, as a rule, to go through some sort of ceremony. These differ widely with the various tribes and are most of them too obscene to be described. It is at this age that tribal or tattoo marks are often made, generally by cicatrizing and rubbing pignient or other material into the Dances are held and there is much cating and beer-drinking. Amongst the Swalidi classes, of boys and girls separacely, are held in which they are instructed in matters pertaining to marriage, after the manner of the Unvago of the Yaos.

With the Kiknyn large dances are held and youths, about to undergo the ceremony, can be seen disporting themselves series with white chalk or wearing neel lets of planted withics or bunches of ragged sker. After such ceremomes the guls are supposed to be marriageable and the youths to have entered into manhood. With the Masar these youths then become warriors. but are not allowed to many until then term of service has expired

COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE

HAVING entered into the state of manbood, the young man, unless he is forbidden to marry so soon, as with the Masai, commences to look out for a wife The young man generally arranges with the father for the pinchase of his daughter, seldom has the latter any say in the With the Latuka and Basoga, however, the young people clope together, the latter always at a funeral dance The lather or brother comes to claim a present subsequently With the former, if the man has not sufficient to pay, the first child is given to the father With the latter the husband hides and deputes a friend or brother to pay off the bride's brother when he calls

It is often prohibited for the man to approach the father directly as to the purchase of his daughter, he must send a representative or approach him through another With the Batoro the man's father arranges with the girl's father. The purchase is generally effected for two cows, but the marriage is not usually held till two years after the payment With the

A KIKUYU GIRL.

Baganda the young people arrange together, then the gull takes the man to her aunt, who takes him to her brother, who takes him to the father. The gull's brother, however, settles the price. The Baganda gull is allowed to journey off to look for a husband. She then wears a number of wire bracelets to show her intentions.

Kaynondo gills are betrothed at the age of six of seven years. From that time onwards the man makes presents to the father. If sufficient presents have accumulated by the time she is of marriageable age, viz., about forty hoes, twenty goats and one cow, he takes her. He then has first call over all the sisters of his wife, as they reach marriageable age. If his wife dies without child the father has to pay back the purchase-money.

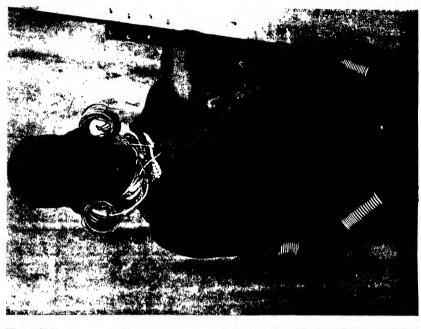

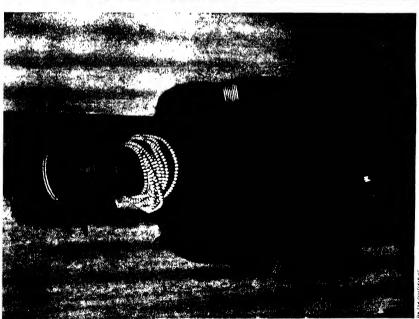

The Suk generally dance in a ring, with certain special dancers in the centre. Whilst some men clap their hands and sing, others leap high into the air, keeping the body perfectly stiff and erect.

With most tribes exogainy is practised, a man is forbidden to marry inside his village or clan Frequently he seeks a wife outside his tribe, for instance, the Rendile intermarry largely with the Samburi, but it is not necessary for them to do so

The price of a marriageable girl varies enormously. With the Lendu as much as sixteen cows and one hundred goats are said to be paid. With the Manyema only thirty goats are paid, and in return for this the father is supposed to provide two male and two female servants for his daughter.

The man generally provides the necessary wedding feast. In Uganda he often has to provide two, one at his house and one at the bride's, for it is not till the evening that he is allowed to see her. The Bahima does not see his wife's face before marriage, as the women always go veiled. Another pecuharity about them is that they do not work in the fields, but the women of their subject race, the Bairu, go unveiled and till the ground.

KIKIYU FASHIONS.

Kiskis women having to do the domestic work, do not, like the men wear elaborate head-dreases, but shave their heads completely, except for a small tuff at the back. Many of their orimments are associated with certain events in their lives but the most valued are the circles of beads worn in the upper part of the ear. It is the ambition of women is wear this in each ear, but the usual number is fiften.

Customs of the World

The father usually receives the wedding present, or if he is dead, the girl's brother. In some tribes he has to give a certain proportion to his brothers, wife, or others. Sometimes he has to give back some of the cows received to his daughter Bahima father receives seven cows and has to give three back to his daughter. Sometimes the mar has to pay a fee, such as a goat, to the chief or the girl's mother, as well as the present to the father With the Basukinna the man has to work for his father-m-law for the first two years after marriage, and then he is permitted to return to his village with his wife. After the wedding there is generally a honeymoon, spent in retirement With the Swahili there is a period of seven days, called Fungate. during which the couple do not leave then lint and are fed by relations. The Bakoki bride spends three months in retire ment, and her relations are not allowed to see her until this is The Baganda wife is supposed to bemoan her fate at becoming the slave of man during this period. After it is over the wife must set to work to hoe the fields and cultivate, as she is solely responsible for providing all food, water and fnewood, as well as for the cooking. In most tribes, as Kiknyu, Wakamba, Basoga, etc., the men help the women in the fields, whilst with the Lendin only the men work. With the Nandi the man proceeds with his parents to the girl's house and, after stopping a few days, returns with her $-\Lambda$ dance is held for three days, then the couple move into a new house built on purpose for them

If the Bakoujo man finds his wife insuitable after marriage he returns her to the father, in which case either the price is returned or a sister given instead. There are numerous observances between father-in-law, or mother-in-law, and son-In most tubes the mother-in-law is present, at the birth and naming of a child

A KAVIRONDO WIZARD

The Kavirondo has certain salves for wounds, but mainly attempts to cure illness by shaking a gourd full of pubbles over the patient

Amongst the Lendu the fatherin-law may not visit his son in-law and with the Batoro he must not even see him The Unyoro son in-law kneels down when he meets his mother-in-law

In some tribes, such as Masai, Igoshi, Wembe, and to a lesser extent Kikuyu, freelove is practised before marmage, but after being married the woman is supposed to live continently The Masai, on retiring from the ranks of the warriors, selects a woman and makes presents of cows, sheep, iron wire and honey-wine to her father. After she is married

A SPIRIT HUT.

W Hatterstu

In many parts of Uhanda the worship of spirits is still carried on by offerings of food and drink placed in little huts

the woman may not return to her father's kraal without her husband. If a wife runs away to another man, the latter usually compensates the husband. It she runs back to her father, the husband usually goes to fetch her, taking a small present with him The relations hear the case on both sides and almost invariably the woman is made to return If she iwas away a second He does not generally do time, the father is supposed to pay back the pinchase-money this with a good grace and often tries to marry off his laughter again first, so as to get the necessary amount. It is from imsunderstandings arising out of this that half or more of the small wars held in miadministered

In some tribes not only the original cows and goats are claimed back, but also then merease. With mest, however, the merease is generally set against the work done by the wife, and so only the original price is Any children resulting from the marriage almost myarably go to the his band, when the pair a c separated, whatever the cause of separation. Any too young to leave the mother are, a la rule, kept by her until they are considered old enough to be returned

RELIGION AND SUPERSHITON

The Swahib and the Baganda are almost entirely Moslem or Christian Apart from these, and converts in other tribes, it might be said. that the people have no defined religion

In many tribes there is a belief in God, or some ommotent being or spirit, such as the Masar Engar meaning god, sky, or rain in whom all believe, but with whom they concern themselves little. More defined, but still vague and nebulous, is their belief in the spirits of ancestors These spirits may be benevolent or harmful, in any case it is policy to appease them. Any untoward event is generally attributed to the malign influence of spirits.

The behef is, amongst many, that only the spirits of great men are hable to return, whilst with others the spirit of anyone may come back to do harm or good. The difference in the mode of disposing of the body of a chief and of a subject is probably due to the first belief. We will see, when we come to the next section, that those people who eat, throw away or discard the bodies of the ordinary man, are careful to bury the chief. Possibly the idea is either to preserve or to appease the wrath of the spirit of the latter - To return to the Supreme Being, the Masai women occasionally pray to Engar for rain, but this is the only known instance of these people entering into any direct communication with him. They are supposed to hold the behef that there were originally four gods, one of which was the ancestor of the tribe, or a part of it. Of these four, Engar alone remains, so the other three must have died. Under stress of great calamity, war, pestilence, or famine, sacrifices are occasionally made to God, as amongst the Kikuyu. On such occasions certain Kikuyu priests ascend a holy hill or enter a sacred grove and sacrifice a sheep at the appointed spot or altar, called Kehalu. A goat is not acceptable. The meat is cooked and eaten by the priests, whilst branches are dipped into the fat, which is then smeared on the trees around. (The native is generally very economical over his sacrifices and does not usually leave Engal any of the meat, but the Hebrews appear to have been the same.) The sheep is killed by suffocation.

These sacred groves (Kahinga) occur plentitully in the Kikuvii country, where they are conspicuous amongst the treeless, cultivated hills. No man may cut down any of the trees of a grove,

The outside of the Suk head dress is generally plastered with white clay whilst ostrich feathers are stuck into the top and a piece of curved iron into the bottom. Notice the custom of pieceing the lower lips with a piece of iron or a quill

if this was done, it is supposed that great sickness or misfortune would follow. Sometimes, where there is no grove, a large tree is set aside as a sacred spot.

Offerings to spirits are made by the great inajority of tribes. The Swahih believe that Jimis or spirits inhabit big or remarkable trees, such as a sycamore or baobab, and offerings are sometimes made at their foot. The offering to the spirits of the dead shows itself with these people in the Sadaka, or offering of alms at the grave of the departed. In a time of trouble the Swahih will prepare food and visit the grave of father or mother, afterwards distributing the food to the poor. Perhaps the Ziyara, or Arab pilgrimage, to a grave originated in some such heathen custom

The Baganda think that the spirits of dead kings enter the beadwork frames which are kept in the tombs of the dead (see illustration on page xxii). Succeeding kings pay periodical visits to the tombs of their predecessors, and in olden times, sacrifices of many hundreds of human beings used to be made at each visit, to appease the spirits. The bones of the victims can still be seen lying round. Spirit worship is, at the present day, more prevalent in Unyoro than Uganda, as these people are not yet so highly Christianized. Amongst the Bahima there is the belief that spirits occasionally return and shake people violently, and the local medicine-men have a special kind of smith or preparation which they apply to the nostrils of one thus shaken up. With the Swahili there is a similar belief.

Many tribes build little miniature liuts for the spirits, and food and offerings are placed in these (see illustration on page 856). The Banyoro build these near dwellings. The Lugware place them near drinking places, and it would appear that any worthless article, such as a broken calabash or cooking-pot, is acceptable to their spirits. The Masai have certain places, called Engorale, which are the abode of spirits. All who pass place stones on the spot and large carris have been formed in this way.

The Kaynondo plant stones in the earth near their houses Goats are sacrificed to the spirits of their ancestors, the flesh is caten and the blood poured over The African's rethese stones ligion is hardly distinguishable from his superstitions, and spirits are often confused with the various devils he believes in The Ba ganda have perhaps the biggest assortment of demons, and many of these have buts or temples built for them, inhabited by priests of the cult - Formerly many hun dreds of human victims used to be offered to Mayanja and Kitinda, the spirits of the leopard and crocodile. The knees and elbows of the victims to Kituida used to be broken, and then they were either thrown into the water or left on the bank for the crocodiles

An African native sees little distinction between chairins and medicines. The Swahih believe in talismans, worn round neck of arm, as a cure for all ills. Also charms are worn for every conceivable purpose. The Lugware tie a smell charm of wood to a bow to make it shoot straight. The

Madi wear a bit of wood round the neck to bring success in love. Medicines, charms and shrines are often placed at the crossing of paths

The African understands a mail being killed in battle, but does not recognize that it is possible to die of sickness or old age. If he sees no visible wound, he assumes that the man has been killed by witchcraft. It is then necessary to find the wizard or witch. Either an enemy is suspected or the witch-doctor is called in to locate the murderer. Even fairly civilized natives, like the Swahili, firmly believe that a person can be killed by having a horn put in his path or a spell cast over him. They also believe that witches are in the habit of eating the dead, and it is chiefly for this reason that they cause death.

Kikuyn medicine-men can eject an evil spirit from anyone by blowing a horn down his throat A goat is sacrificed on the threshold, and the Bugu is cast. If one good stone comes forth the patient will get healed. This Bugu is largely used by the Swahili and Wanyika, who call it Mburuga, Ramli, or Bao. It consists of a going containing a number of small stones, shells and lancy objects. By its means they affect to foretell the future, or prescribe medicine. Some stones are thrown out and the medicine-man pretends to study the way in which they have fallen. Other methods of divination by the coast doctors are—throwing down a little bundle of sticks, looking into sand, or mixing shuff and ashes and smelling it. The Wanyika and Swahili are supposed to be able to put a spell over a garden or well which makes the produce or water innocuous to themselves but deadly to strangers.—Similarly the Masai beheve that snakes guard their water-holes.

A CEREMONIAL DANCE, TAVETA DISTRICT

In the Taveta district, which lies near Mount Kilimanjaro, the young girls of the tribe are, according to a wide-spread custom, secluded for a considerable period before attaining womanhood. During this time they are taught by the adult women various kinds of work and dancing

DEATH AND BURIAL

Os death it is generally customary to wash the corpse. This is done by the wives or women of the household of the deceased. The Swahih place the body on a bedstead in the centre of the lint and dig a hole in the floor beneath it, into which the water used for washing falls. After being washed, the corpse is wrapped in a shroud of white bafuta, or glazed calico, and taken to the grave on a bier, where it is buried with Muhammadan rites. In Uganda, on the leath of the Kabaka, the Katikno, or prime immister, came, and the princes were drawn up below him. He then asked the keeper of the princes which was most suitable to succeed, and the latter touched one. That one then became Kabaka, and was given a roll of bark-cloth with which to wrap up the dead king. (At the present moment the selection of a new king hes with the Lukiko, or native connoil.)

An ordinary subret would be simply buried, but the body of a king would be taken to the site for the tomb and put on a raised platform under jaw was then cut off and put in a wooden dish A big but or tomb was then built round the body and the door shut for Human sacrifices of several hundred victims used then to be made before the door and their bodies left to the vultures The under jaw, ornamented with cowrie-shells, was placed in a but built near The whole was surrounded by an enclosure, and huts for the guardians and the wives of the dead king were built in this, it being their duty to watch over the tomb till they died, when others replaced them

Mutesa, the last king but one, gave the order that no human sacrifices were to be made at his death, and since then none have been made. A number of women still keep watch over the tombs of Mutesa and other tombs. (See illustration on page 871.)

The Banyoro have a horror of dying at night, as it is believed that the sprits are able to seize them at that time. Owing to this, it is stated, very sick people are sometimes buried alive in the daytime for fear of them dying at night. The body is swathed in back cloth or, if very poor, in grass, and buried near the birt. A clief is sewn up in the skin of a freshly killed cow. The legs are drawn up close to the body, the palms of the hands are placed together and under the head. The body is laid, on its left side, in the grave, bark-cloth is thrown in and the grave filled up. The Mukama, or king, used to be swathed in the same way and placed in a large grave with nine living men. The grave was not filled in, but a skin was pegged tightly over the month and a hut or tomb erected over it. In this hut the king's headman and servants lived to watch over the grave.

The Masar, Suk and Turkana wail over their dead and then take the body out into the bush,

With the Kikuyn the ordinary people are laid out in the bush, as with the Masai, but clincis are buried in their huts. The hit is then pulled down on the top of the grave—Big clincis, and even their wives, are occasionally buried in the sacred groves.

A big dance and beer-drink is generally held after a burial or at the end of the mourning. With the Madi there is often sham fighting, everyone gets very excited, and it is not uncommon for men to be killed or badly wounded at these functals.—The Kaynondo bury a chief in a sitting posture

The Baziba have cemeteries far from their villages, and the body is wrapped in matting and buried there. Chiefs are buried like the Kaynondo, with head above the ground and in sitting posture. A guard is placed to watch the head. After two months it is shoved underground and a new chief is elected.

The Baziba son wears a string round his neck to which are attached two bits of wood, representing father and mother, as each dies the corresponding piece of wood is thrown away

The widows of the deceased generally go to the eldest son or the brother, varying with different tribes. As a rule they cannot marry again until a certain period of mourning is over, and then not without consent of their guardian.

With the Swahili the widow has to go into retirement for three months, called Kuketi na Eda. She may not go out during this time, but may be visited by relations. She carries a long stick in her hand and wears sandals.

As a rule, murder, theft, adultery and witchcraft are the only offences punishable

The murder of a man of another tribe is not usually looked on as an offence, and often no notice is taken of the murder of a wife Among the Banyoro and Bahima murder is punishable with death, with the Masar by a fine of variable rate, with the Basukuma a hundred goats are paid for a stolen—In the old days in Uganda thieving was not punished unless it was a chief's property that was stolen—With the Lendu it is left to a man to find out and punish a thief if he can himself—The Baziba return the equivalent of the theft to the owner, the Basikuma fine all a thief's property, and the Karamojo punish theft by death

Amongst the Bahima the third is fined c'ouble the value of the thing stolen. This was the old Roman law, which held also in the North of Africa. This, and the fact that the Bahima, alone amongst Central African women, are veiled, has given rise to the supposition that these people have fairly recently emigrated from the north

Adultery is generally punishable with a fine to the wronged husband. Sometimes this amounts to the original price of the wife, and sometimes it is only a goat. With the Masai and Nandi it is not looked on as a serious offence, but is occasionally met with a fine. Some tribes, however, punish this offence severely and, if it is an unmarried girl, by death. The Manyema, both husband, and wife, make war on the man or woman with whom their partners have committed adultery. If one is killed in so doing the relations must take up the feud

Witchcraft is almost always punished by death, but it is first necessary to find out the witch or wizard. For this purpose, when anyone dies unaccountably, a medicine-man is called in and it is his duty to discover the culprit. Having, by his craft, shown whom he imagines it to be, the suspect has often to undergo trial by ordeal. In some cases poison is given, viz., Kavirondo. If the suspect dies or does not bring up the poison he is guilty. The Basoga have an ordeal in which clay and grass are mixed up in a pot. A hump is then taken out and thrown or slapped on the suspect. If it sticks he is guilty, but if it falls to the ground he is immocent. The Swahih have a test in which the suspect has his mouth filled with dry rice. If he is able to swallow it, he is immocent, but if he is imable to, his mouth being dry through lear, he is guilty. There are many other ordeals, by boiling water, red-hot nons, etc.

Amongst most tribes the head, especially with men, is completely shaved of intervals, and sometimes, on certain occasions, both men and women are shaved all over. The Kara nojo, Baziba and many others pull out the han of the beard as it grows, an Lit is perhaps for this reason that Africans can seldom grow a beard of more than an inch or two. The Basukuma pull out also the cyclashes and cyclosws, whilst the Bakonjo pull out the cyclashes and shave the cyclosws.

From the earliest times hair-cutting has been connected with various ceremonies, we read in the Bible of vows being made not to cut the hair until certain events come to pass. Such vows are made to this day on the coast, and there is one historic case in which a certain Sultan's son made a vow that he would not cut his hair until he broke into the city of Pate. After a long period of war, Instroop broke in and he had his head shaved in front of the principal mosque.

The Swalnh men usually shave the head and year small skull-caps. The women only shave the head miler certain circumstances sickness, or as a sign, of Usually they mourning plant the hair in ridges close to the head and dress it with coco-nut oil Masar youths are shaved all over, just before they become warriors From that time forward, till they become old men, the hair is allowed to grow They, and the Kamasia and Dorobo (Ogick) usually grow the hair in pig-tails (see illustration on page 864), the Kikuyu sometimes copy this style The han is generally treated with red earth and grease, and a tightly fitting cap, made of a goat's stomach, is sometimes worn to protect this from the rain. Masai and Kikuyu women shave the head, and at any rate always keep the hair just over the forehead shaved, as they carry burdens by a strap passing round the

The Turkana and Suk men entwine their own hair with that of their ancestors and plaster it with mud. At death the father's han is cut off and his son inherits it. The result is seen in their wonderful chignons (see illustrations on pages 857 and 858), all of which are composed of the man's own han entwined with that of his ancestors. This chignon forms a sort of bag with a pocket behind. In this are placed tobacco or anything small it is regumed to carry. There is a small clain of Rendile who may not eat camel or goat. The Wakamba eat all kinds of flesh, and it is said sometimes even hvæna

Africans are, in their way, fairly musical, but their music is more of thythii than of harmony. The chief instrument in practically every tribe is the drinn, with the Masai it is the only instrument—It is made of a hollowed log, with a skin stretched over the end.—The skin is generally that of a goat, but is sometimes that of a monitor or big lizard. The drum occurs in all sizes and figures largely in every ceremony, it is sounded for peace, for war, to produce rain, as an alarm, and as a telegraph Dances are held in honour of almost every event, and at these the drum and beer-drinking are the cluef features—The Sese islanders and the Manyema signal to each other by drum-beats

The best military organization is found amongst the Masai, each male of which has to serve a period of from seven to ten years as a warnor, during which time he may not marry with one spear and also generally a sword (see illustration on page 860). Some of the Kiknyu adopt the same kind of spear and sword which is shaped raich like the old Roman sword, but the warno's are not highly organized like the Masar and they are per nitted to many. CHAPTER XXXIV

SOUTH AFRICA, By LOUDON M DOUGLAS, FRSE.

The march of civilization has been very rapid in the southern part of the African continent, and at the present day it is rapidly moulding the native races into newer and better types. It cannot be said, however, that the numbers are decreasing before the advance of the white man, as every thing goes to show that, under the better conditions which civilization provides, the native races seem to grow and multiply

The natives of Nyasaland nit very fond of such games and similar anusements and the children especially have many diversions of this sort. Bao," a draught-board of Eastern Africa, is found all over Negro Africa except in the Congo forests.

In the old days war was the principal occupation of the natives of South Africa, and, as a consequence, whole tribes were frequently wiped out to gratify the mere lust for slaughter

There seems little doubt that the different races, which have so many variations in South African countries, originated in Central Africa, and came from that equaterial people generally described as the Bantu race, and which, in South Africa, have been generally described as Kaffirs. But the various races have been modified by admixture with these old primitive hunters, now known to us as the Bushmen, and the legends with regard to them are many. At the present day these diminutive people, averaging below five feet in height, are in the process either of dying out, or of being absorbed by the other native races. They were the first to spread over South Africa, and over a long period of years occupied the hunting-grounds in the rich wooded plants, but when the stronger races arrived, the Bushmen were pushed back, or gradually exterminated, until at the present day only scattered remnants remain, such as may be found in the great Kalahari Desert, or in such places as are remote from civilization, where they may drink their mead and smoke their dacha from the weird pipes which they mainifiacture, or gather water in the ostrich shells which, even at this day, form drinking-eips amongst them. The traveller in South Africa cannot but be interested in the cave pictures and the rock inscriptions which are to be seen in many places, and which are evidence that the primitive Bushmen race had artistic aspirations.

Following up the scattering of the Bushinen, the tribes with which we are familiar at the present day took possession and spread all over the country

One classification of the different races is given by Stow, who states that these races came upon the South African scene in the following order

The Barotse are very formal in their salutations, kneeling and kissing the hands. They sometimes rock their bodies from side to side smacking themselves, and shouting words of praise and welcome

- I The Hottentot tribes, a nomadic pastoral race, armed with bows and arrows, originally without poison, and sometimes shields and miserably small javelins
- II The agricultural and pastoral Bachoana (Bechuana) and Basutu tribes from the north, also armed with bows and arrows, small shields, assagais, clubs and battleaxes.
- 111. The pastoral and more warlike Coast Kafiirs, the Amaxosa, and other frontier tribes, armed with javelins or assagais, and immense shields cut from an entire ox-hide.
 - IV The Abatembu and Amampondo tribes, with assagais, clubs and oval shields
- V. The Amazulu, Matabih (Matabele) and Natal tribes, with large oval shields, and short broad-bladed stabbing assagais, with which they charged at close quarters.
 - VI. The tribes of Basutuland, with assagais, battleaves and deeply indented shields.
 - VII. The men of the Dutch settlement
 - VIII. The English occupation

In Cape Colony the natives are more or less of a nondescript character, and while they have in kraals in certain parts of the Colony, it cannot be said that they maintain their ancient traditions, and it is quite likely that in a very few years' time the black races all over the southern states of South Africa will be so moulded by the white man's customs as to become a new race.

In Basutuland the transition is much slower, and this is possibly due to the fact that the Basutus, whose country is to the cast of the Orange River Colony, are a fall, warlike race of superior intelligence, and pressessing many virtues. Like all the Minean races, however, they look upon war as being the principal object of existence, but they are not particularly addacted to the taking of human life. The high sense of nearon which they seem to possess may be "the autom one of their proverbs, which says." The person of an ambessador is sacred, whiteever may be his message."

The women of the Bisutn do most of the filling of the soil, and they been the beer which is the common intoxicating liquor found all over South Africa, but which may vary in somness according to locality certainly is a drink for which a taste has to be acquired. Witchcraft prevails throughout the tribe, and the witch-doctor still has a powerful hold over the amaginations of the prople, special ceremonies being associated with birth, marriage, or death, in which the witch-doctors play the principal part, as they do still in rain-making, exorcizing storms, and driving away the plague. Their principal function, however, is what may be described as the initiating of the boys and girls, who, between the ages of fourteen and sixteen, are set apart in remote places, and are drilled in a kind of discipline which is meant to give them self-control, and enable them to defend themselves. The observance of ancient customs, which is included at this time, has a very permetous effect on the lives of the men and women. The more harmless of these customs involve dancing, more especially at night, and drinking

Marriage is merely a contract between the two families concerned, and the status of the woman is regulated very much by the number of cattle she is supposed to be worth

It is stated by C. W. McIntosh that the giving of the cattle by the bridegroom serves a threefold purpose first of all, all rights to the children of the marriage are thus transferred from the bride's family to the bridegroom's, secondly, provision is thus made for the children in case of divorce or desertion, and,

Zululand is now a comparatively small territory in the north of Natal, and it contains all that is left of the powerful Zulu tribes, which at one time ruled South Africa. The Zulus covered a large portion of the country, and comprised Zulus proper, the Kosas, Galekas, Garkas, Tembos, and the other branches of the Kaffir race, being identical in speech, and having the same religious behefs and social customs. The Zulus owed their greatness to Chaka, the great Zulu chief, who bound all the various sections of the Zulu race together to fight against the aggression of the white man. Chaka was succeeded by Daugaan, whose blood-thirsty reign was terminated in Natal by force of arms, but his greatest captain, Unishkatze, survived, and, driven from the Transvaal, he took his legions further north over the Emipopo into Matabeleland, where he ruled the country now known as Rhodesia, and was succeeded by Lobengula, the last of the great Zulu chiefs, who was overthrown in 1893. The military power of the Zulus from that day has practically disappeared, but their social customs remain, and the various branches of the race extend away beyond the Zambesi to Lake Tanganyika, where the warlike Angoni are to be met with (see Ilustration on page 887), who are among the most remote of the representatives of the Zulu nation.

Where the Zulus are allowed to carry on their traditions, they live in kraals under chiefs, appointed by themselves. The chief has the power to allot the land, which does not necessarily descend from one generation to another. The family life is only a variation of the general rule which obtains throughout the savage races in Africa. Polygamy is only held in check by the poverty of the bridegroom, who may buy as many wives as he pleases, but as the Zulus of the

BASUTO WARRIORS IN WAR DRESS

The Basutos form one of the most interesting of native races in South Africa, and the men have always been distinguished as great warriors, which was considered the only occupation that a man could follow. At the present day the warlike spirit is being modified under civilized administration.

AN ANGONI GIRL

The Angoni women have to bring the water from the spring, and stores to the hut, and provide the other domestic requirements. They cook the food for the men, who eat apart, and brew the brei, as well as perform much of the agricultural work.

Then, as now, the Kalahari was inhospitable, but, as we have seen, was noted as being the home of the Bushnen, who instinctively seem to be able to find water for the traveller in what appears to be a mere sandy waste. Livingstone found that the Bechuanas named their tribes after certain animals, which he attributed to animal-worship. He says: "The term Bakatla means—they of the monkey, Bakuena—they of the alligator; Ballapi—they of the fish; each tribe having a superstitious dread of the animal after which it is called. They also use the word 'bina,' to dance, in reference to the custom of thus naming themselves, so that when you wish to ascertain what tribe they belong to, you say. 'What do you dance?'—It would seem as if that had been a part of the worship of old. A tribe never eats the animal which is its namesake, using the term 'ila,' hate, or dread, in reference present day are poor, the mere necessity of the case has driven a great portion of them to having one wife only. An orderly system of justice prevails, fines being now imposed where at one time death would have been awarded. Superstition forms a large part of their religious belief, and charms and portents are believed in by all, and the meantations of the medicine man form part of the social life. The power of this individual, however, is not nearly so great as it was, owing to the contact with the white races. The God of the Zulus is called "Mornno," to whom they are in the habit of praying, and who is some kind of indefinite being who might be the spirit of an ancestor, or may have taken possession of an animal native state the children are allowed to grow up without any particular care until, at the ages of from fourteen to sixteen, they are taken to separate camps, and have to participate in certain ceremonies, some of which are of a brutal and degrading character, but which are considered essential before they can be recognized as men and women

One of the largest tracts of territory waiting to be developed in South Africa is Bechnanaland, where the population is considerably less than in other states of the continent. This is due very largely to the fact that much of the territory is dry sand. The Kalahari Desert extends over a large portion of Bechnanaland, and it will be remembered that we first learned its physical features from the travels of Dr. Livingstone between 1849 and 1856. Then, as now, the Kalahari was inhosiome of the Bushmen, who instinctively to killing it. We find traces of many ancient tribes in the country in individual members of those now extinct, as the Batán—they of the lion, the Banóga—they of the serpent, though no such tribes now exist."

The Bechuanas love to dance in the full moon, and as they are great cultivators of the soil, they celebrate successful harvests in this particular way. A number of men form a circle, and to the sound of the tom-tom, with its monotonous notes, jump round about, throwing sugar canes in the manner of the assagar. The music may also be provided by a primitive flute with two holes, but the monotony of the sound is quite as bad as that of the tom-tom. The women join the men in these dances, which are of the simplest character, and the principal actions seem to be the clapping of hands, and jumping round in a large circle.

As with the Bantu races, the wife is purchased with so many bullocks, and very often a good deal of haggling takes place over the bargam, but should there be a divorce or separation, the children belong to the wife, and it is a curious thing that it a wife is not properly purchased, she occupies a lower social status than one whose rights have been established by the ancient custom

The Bechuana women are particularly addicted to the wearing of ornaments round their necks, arms, waists and ankles ever coils of beads in various colours, sometimes arranged

As we have seen, the Zulus extended to the far north, and the Matabele of Southern Rhodesia are merely a branch of that great nation, but the Matabele rose to great prominence under their chief Lobengula, whose power was broken in 1803. This warlike spirit of the Matabele has, under the influence

In some of the tribes of Northern Rhodesia the custom still exists of distending the lips by means of discs, and so alterins, the facial expression of civilization, almost disappeared, and for the most part those who inhabit Southern Rhodesia are engaged either in the mines or in the peaceful pursuits of agriculture

The Mashonas are a somewhat older race than the Matabele, and they and the Makalakas were in possession of Southern Rhodesia before the Matabele attained their great eminence.

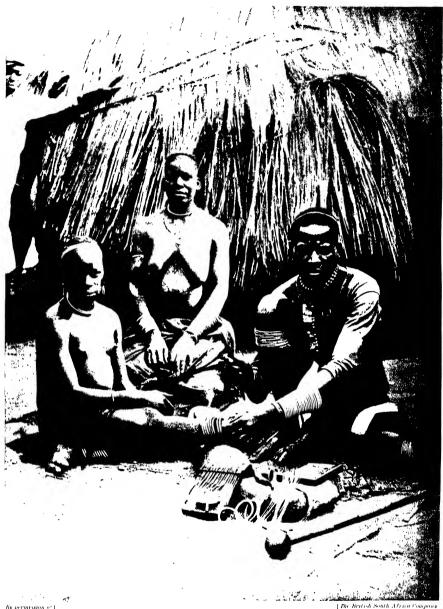

The hair is dressed in the conical Zulu manner, and kep-together by an ornamental metal band of ornate design. The neck and wrist ornaments vary in design, but brass is improving, and the main factor in suppressing the ancient custom is the great cost of living Amongst the Matabele the widows of the deceased are taken to wife by his brothers (very much on the lines of the old Sadducean law), under what is termed the Ukungena system. Under Mashona law the widows often become the wives of their deceased husband's sons, but a son never takes his own mother or any blood relation of hers.

Mashonas are an interior race, and do not compare in physique with the descendants of the Matabele warriors Under the British South Africa Company it has been thought wise to interfere as little as possible with the native customs of Matabeleland and Mashonaland, and thus we find that throughout the whole of the territory native kraals exist under Indunas, or petty chiefs, who are responsible to the Government of the country

The exchange of cattle for wives is known amongst the natives as lobolo, and has now been limited, in the case of the daughter of a chief to five heads of cattle, and in the case of all other native women to four heads of cattle, or their equivalent, and the advantage of this has been clearly proved, masmuch as it gives freedom of choice to girls in connection with marriage A custom which dies hard among t the natives is the promising of children of tender years in marriage for valuable consideration, but an attempt has been made to put this down by law

The custom of polygamy exists, and is recognized by the Legislature, but, owing to nussionary efforts and influence, the status of the women

NATIVE DRESS, LAKE BANGWEOLO

Around the Lake of Bangweolo there are many nondescript tribes allied to the Awemba and the more powerful races. Some of these dress in the skins of antelopes, stamped out in

Amongst the Mashonas superstitions still exist, and there is a general belief in charms and witchcraft. The lower grade of Mashona believes that he may meet death through the instrumentality of some fellow being who may have a grudge against him, or that he may be subjected to a visitation of evil by the spirit of a departed friend or relative whom he may have slighted while living.

"When," says Harvey Brown, " a member of the community dies, the body is usually buried under a shelf of rock in a reclining position with arms folded and legs doubled up. In some districts where heaps of rock are scarce, I have seen graves made in large antheaps. As a rule a small canopy or thatched roof is built over the grave, and under this it is common to see placed as an offering, a pot of beer and a plate of The beer evaporates, and the ants cat the sadza, but to the Mashona mind the disappearance is due to supernatural causes."

The social life of the Mashonas and Matabele is much influenced by the use of Kaffir beer, which is prepared by the women from fermented Kaffir corn. In the kraals this beer is drunk very often to great excess, by men, women and children, and has a most demoralizing effect. On the other hand, the mitritive value and anti-scorbutic effect of Kaffir beer has often been demonstrated, and it is very difficult to devise any means by which its consumption could be limited.

During times of festival, Kaffin beer is consumed in large quantities, and social gatherings consist of numbers of men and women collected together, who gradually become intoxicated. During such gatherings the music of the tom-tom or the one-stringed violin is the monotonous accompaniment, and the more excited men of the party will execute wild dances, accompanied by shouting and cries of admiration from the onlookers. One after another, however, these wild spirits drop out, and as the alcohol begins to take effect, they become insensible to their surroundings.

In Northern Rhodesia, which borders on the Belgian Congo and German East Africa, there has hardly been so much progress as in the Southern State, and the natives in these territories are less under civilized control than the Matabele and Mashonas

The principal native race to be found in Northern Rhodesia is the Barotse, which is a tribe that has largely imigled with the natives from Mozambique and Portugue e East Africa, but they seem to have many characteristics in common with the Mashonas, and their domestic customs are some what similar (see illustration on page 876). They are, however, not a very cleanly race, and the whole family herd together in their circular huts, along with dogs goats, fowls, and sometimes even cattle.

The Barotse are not an energetic race, and the objects of their existence seem to be limited to the procuring of sufficient tool to eat and plenty of beer to direk. Curiously enough, the Barotse children are very teachable, and where they have a charge, become adopts in the making of ornaments from iron and brass.

Colonel Harding, who had unique epportimities for studying the Barotse, states that in Barotseland no subject speaks to the king without prefacing his remarks by clapping of the hands, which, in the etiquette of Barotseland, is considered a sign of respect

When a Barotse dies, his spirit is ushered into the next world by sacat noise, which is kept up for several days, and which may be produced by the discharge of firearms so as to indicate that the deceased was a great hunter

As in other South Athean andes, super-tition prevails, and witch-doctors are ever present. Trial by ordeal is not infrequent. "The culprit naturally enough protests his innocence, and is allowed the privilege of proving it by placing his hand in a cauldion of boiling water. Sometimes, partly owing to a thick increst tion of long accumulated drit and grease, the hand may suffer but hittle injury. There is a silence, and the witch-doctor shakes in his shoes, and declares that that particular hand may be innocent. Accordingly the pot is again placed on the fire, and this time the

He is promptly hustled away to the nearest tree, bark is produced and securely fastened and field together to form a stake, and to this the poor wietch is secured and surrounded by dry sticks and faggots—before long a few charred remains alone mark the spot of this diabolical outrage—The drums are beaten, the village is en fete, and the witch-doctor who has destroyed the evil spirit receives the deceased man's effects as a small reminder of his dastardly zeal."

Such practices are, of course, being suppressed by the administration of the country, but it is difficult to get rid of the traditions of centuries

While the Barotse is the principal tribe in Northern Rhodesia, there are many others of a subsidiary character, the consideration of which hardly comes within the scope of our present purposes, such as the Masakulumbwe, the M'lala, and the M'senga. The Aweniba, however, should be noticed, as it is amongst these that the native traditions seem to be carried out to a greater extent than amongst the more powerful Barotse.

At the birth of a child the nurse, who is usually an old woman, receives the confession of the mother, who confesses all the sins of her life, and such confidences are regarded as sacred. According to Charlotte Mansfield. "The newly-born child is first washed, and then a little salt is placed in its mouth, after which the nurse hands it back to the mother, and invites the father to enter the hit. The child is given to him, and after he has looked at it he returns it to the mother. If the birth has occurred during the day, he then goes out immediately to inform the neighbours.

The Angoni are a branch of the great Zulu race, which migrated to the north and settled around the northern shore of Lake Tanganyika and towards Nyasaland. They were at our time celebrated for their barbaious raids amongst the surrounding tribes, more especially the Awemba. Their customs are not unlike those of the Zulus of the present day.

"If the baby is a boy, he says 'Wa-kanando' ('He is for the hoe'), and if a girl he says 'Wa-mpeto' ('She is for the null'). Then the wife's friends come to say 'Samalale mukwar' ('Congratulations'). If the mother and child die at childbirth, then the bodies are buried at cross-roads, and the natives think the mother must have smied greatly, and when women pass that way to draw water, they say over the grave 'Wapoleni' ('Is it well with yon?'), and thus strive to conciliate the dead woman's spirit'

There are many other quaint rites in connection with early childhood, all of which fill a considerable place in the domestic life of the tribe, and it is wonderful to find that the Awemba, as distinguished from many other tribes of South Africa, take great care of the upbringing of the children, female children especially being carefully guarded by their mothers.

Marriage, which is arranged by a third party, is somewhat after the European model, there being a formal betrothal, and on the occasion of the wedding, presents are given to both bride and bridegroom The subsequent proceedmgs are long-drawn-out, and the wedding ceremony, with its many variations, some of them of rather a stupid character, extends over a month, and it is not until another month after that the bride and bridegroom live together as man and wife. These ceremonies are performed only in connection with the first two wives which a man may take, and should he add to the number, he must provide a separate but for each

If a man's wife dies, her sister or nearest relation takes her place, and should she be too young, her father must provide a substitute till she is grown up. The widower carries beer to his wife's grave, after which he associates with his new wife.

When the Awemba die, their bodies are wrapped in blankets, and the relatives pray to the departed, promising to put beer on the tombs and look after the children. The body is lowered into an open grave, and, after prayers have been said, a near relative cuts a hole in the covering blanket just over the ear, so that the deceased may hear the Great Spirit speak

One of the famous branches of the Zulu nation pressed northward at the great emigration to Northern Rhodesia, and became famous in war as the Angoni. Their territory was around the lower part of Lake Tanganyika, and although at the present day their fierce raids amongst neighbouring tribes have been curtailed, they still carry on the many traditions of the Zulu race, and they claim that they have never been beaten by the Awemba, the most powerful tribe bordering on the Angoni territory

Another interesting country, better known perhaps than Northern Rhodesia, is that of Nyasaland, bordering on Lake Nyasa, of which there is little to say that would be comparable with the backward state of other tribes in Central Africa, as the whole country is being so rapidly civilized that savage customs which, in the days of Livingstone, obtained amongst the natives, are becoming things of the past

From what has been said it will be gathered that in the Southern portion of the African Continent there are a great many principal tribes of natives, and the number of subsidiary tribes is also very great indeed. The customs which prevail, however, are the customs of the dominating native races with variations introduced to gratify local imagination. But, generally speaking, it may be said that before another generation has passed away the influence of civilization will have asserted itself all over Central and Southern Africa, and the white race will then be face to face with the great problem of whether the educated black races, in all their millions, as they will be then, are to return to the possession of the lands which belonged to their savage forefathers, and which they lost by the aggressiveness of the white man, or whether the white man and black will work together for the development of this rich and fertile territory.

rites necessary to his eternal welfare? Consequently, the natives of Madagascar are very fond of their children, and, not content with those that nature gives them, take pleasure in adopting others whenever they can - As a result of the feudal organization which before the French conquest ran through most of the tribes of the island, it used to be important that the head of the family should be as powerful as possible, and the more children and slaves he had about him the more powerful he was The birth of a child, therefore, was always an occasion for joy. Not that there was any special form of rejoicing In many tribes the head of the household simply an nonneed, in an invocation to God and his ancestors, that the family had received an After this, among mercase the Sakalaya, for example, a memorial post was erected eastward of the headman's hut. and this no one might touch without committing sacrilege, and bringing on himself the heaviest punishment which usually take place at the age of three months, but sometimes much later, as among the Sakalaya, whose hair is left for several years and often becomes umpleasantly matted. Frequently, under the guidance of the Mpanandro or the Mpisikidy (astrologer or sorcerer), who is always consulted as to the destiny of the child and the favourable days for the ceremonies, a young baby is given for some years a common, ill-sounding name—to avert the bad luck which threatens it.

The Malagasy, especially the Sakalava, whose laziness is proverbial, are very fond of games. They often make large parties, the stakes consisting of eggs.

Customs of the World

Children are left to themselves from a very early age. Then mothers look after them physically with great care, and while they are unable to walk, carry them on their backs devotedly, whether working in the fields or occupied in the house (see illustration on page 869). But moral and intellectual education in the family does not exist, and a child grows up with all its defects inheeded and uncorrected.

In certain tribes, especially in Inierma, the father and mother, unless they belong to the Andriana, or noble caste, proudly take the name of their first-born, preceded by the words Ray (father) and Reny (mother), in place of their own names—The happy father of a child called Koto is thus Raikoto, and the mother Renikoto

For all their love of their children and their desire for a large family, the Malagasies have, nevertheless, always practised—and, it is to be feared, still practise in the extreme south—the horrible custom of infanticide whenever a child is born on an unlinky day—The month Alakaosy, the unith of the lunar year, is especially evil for ordinary births, it being believed that those arriving during it will turn out wicked, and will be the cause of their parents' deaths or will at least ill-treat them, but for the birth of princes it is favourable, for the Malagasies say that to be a great and famous prince you must be wicked and trainple everyone under foot—Usually the poor little wretch born in Ilakaosy is buried alive or drowned—In some cases the parents lay it at the entrance of a cattlepen, and if the cattle go in without crushing it, then the omen is propritions, and the child is taken up and reared—At other times it is exposed in an open field and left to its fate—Some charitable woman may, if she like, rescue it and adopt it, but it never goes back to its own family

A NATIVE DANCE, TANANARIVO

Li to andidie

Young girls crowned with flowers are seen dancing a children's dance, while their little companions accompany them, clapping their hands in cadence. The little girls wear the large white garment (lambs) which is the national costume.

This dance is one of the favourite amusements of the Malapasies. It is characterized by slow movements and careless and princiful attitudes. The dancers advance slowly with their feet while making odd contortions with their aims.

All the Malagasies, until the quite recent conversion of part of the population to Christianity, underwent the most common initiatory ceremony in the world. This rite went back to the most ancient times and preceded the arrival of the Arabs in Madagascar. It does not take place, as among the Jews, a few days after birth, but the child is allowed to reach a certain age, usually six or seven years. It is accompanied by grand festivities, which used to differ somewhat in the interior and on the coast. Sacrifices are offered, notably of bulls, and there are some weird customs, which need not be described here. All those who attend, as well as the near relatives of the children, must go through certain religious exercises for days beforehand.

Morals in Madagascar are very lax. Young girls and immarried women may behave as they like without causing general criticism or the reproaches of their families, friends, or acquaintances, especially should they be clever enough to obtain rich presents. Nor is marriage among the Malagasies an insoluble bond, it is broken for the idlest of causes. It often takes place at a very tender age, and it is not rare to see couples of twelve or thirteen. The consent of father and mother is asked, but usually only after a fair previous trial of matrimony. Consent being obtained, a present is made to the parents, which varies among the different tribes, and the husband may then take his wife home. Parents are treated with great respect and affection. To act otherwise towards them, it is believed, would bring down on the iniditiful one the curse of his ancestors as well as a whole cloud of evils, and he would be, moreover, the object of universal reprobation

The principal occupations of women in Madagascar are the pounding of a sufficient quantity of rice for family consumption each day, the weaving, in a primitive fashion, of stufts—sometimes silk, more often cotton or other fibre—for clothing, and the making of mats, baskets, and hats out of rushes or rice-straw. They work also on the land, and in the coast districts they catch small fish in the lagoons and rivers. As for the men, unless, like some of the Merina, they are merchants (i|e|, bawkers of European or native wares), they live in almost total idleness, except at the seasons of sowing and reaping. They generally make good herdsmen, for such a pursuit suits their natural laziness. Some of the Merina, however, are clever working. blacksmiths, carpenters, or goldsmiths

The coast Malagases, whose sole occupation is fishing, are often clever sailors. Their pirogues are very well built (see illustration on page 890). On the eastern coast these are immense trectrunks, hollowed out and capable of carrying several tons of merchandise or some dozens of passengers. In the extreme north and west they are quite different, like the pirogues of Occania, they are long, very narrow, and tapering, made of light wood and fitted at the side with an outrigger to give them stability. On the rivers the pirogues are hollowed trunks, sometimes in the west bound two together.

The Milagasses are extremely found of music, and have a great variety of musical instruments. Those shown are (from left to right) the flute, the guitar, the Limiko (two precis of wood struck together) the guitar made of bamboo, the drum, the gourd-guitar, and the shell blown as a call to a meeting or to church.

If dolce far mente is the normal state of the Malagasies, they nevertheless are great pleasurelovers. Every family event is the occasion for parties and fêtes. Births, marriages, deaths, the building of a new house, the arrival of a distinguished stranger, the end of some public calamity, such as an epidemic or a flood, etc.—all are made pretexts for rejoicings—Bulls are killed, much rum is consumed, and the affair winds up in general drunkenness.

All over the island dancing is one of the favourite amusements (see illustration on page 893). The dances are characterized by slow movements, by graceful, nonchalant attitudes, the feet take short steps, while the arms go through curious contortions. Men and women do not dance together.

BETSIMISARAKA WATER-CARRIFRS

On the east coast, where the climate is very hot and damp, the vegetation is luxuriant, and magnificent bamboos grow there, as fine as those of Indo-China. These bamboos are of immense value to the natives, and are used for a great variety

The national costume of the Malagasies is the lamba—This is a large piece of strift, over two yards square, which is sometimes of brilliant-coloured silk, as in Imerina, but is more often of white cotton of European origin—In the south eastern provinces several tribes still keep their old costume of reed-matting, a kind of sheath or tube, into which they climb and which they fasten with a girdle round the waist—This dress is neither graceful nor clean—The Betsumsaraka often wear a tunic of rafia-thread, which is a good enough protection against the rain—Their women have a skirt

Their women have a skirt and a little jacket called akanjo, which covers the breast, the shoulders and the aims, leaving the waist bare like an Indian woman's

The religion of the Malagasies is very simple They believe in one God, whom they call Zanahary, ie, the universal creator But this god, being good in his essence and consc quently incapable of doing evil, is comparatively neg lected. His attributes are vague, and there is no cult of him, properly speaking. On the other hand, the ghosts of ancestors (for all the Malagasies believe in a future life) are the objects of the greatest veneration and inspire extraordinary terror. They are credited with complete power, for good or ill, over the hymg. to whom they may even pay visits from time to time A deceased husband sometimes comes to see his wife, and in this case the birth of posthumous children is looked on as per-feetly legitimate. The amestors receive offerings, usually a morsel of beef and a few drops of rum, which are brought to the grave of him whose favour it is desired to gain

The Malagasies recognize no natural death except in the rare cases of extreme old age. They therefore always attribute the loss of life to charms and witcheraft. They are careful never to leave about cut hair, nail-parings, and the like, for fear lest a sorcerer might get hold of them and use them to work evil. The Sakalava kings used always to be accompanied by a servant whose sole duty it was to gather up the earth upon which they spat.

The Malagasy really engages in no action of any importance without consulting the sorcerer, who in his divinations makes use of the Sikity, a hamiful of grain which he have out on a mat has no more power. This custom of fady, which recalls the taboo of Oceania, is extremely curious and prevails throughout. Madagascar. There are spots which are fady to everyone, while others are so to certain families or even certain individuals only. There are even fady days, during which no business may be undertaken or journey made. There are also fady words, which are no longer pronounced and which are therefore disappearing from the language—such as those which entered into the names of the Sakalaya kings and might not be used after their death. The fady has really a religious character, its aim being to avert the wiath of the spirits and to gain their favour.

One cannot properly speak of a moral code among the Malagasies. One might say that their religion authorizes anything and recognizes no sins except failures to observe the external formalities; and these sins can be purged by the smallest offerings. At the moment of death many Malagasies make before their families a public confession of the faults which they have committed during their lifetime and their announce their last wishes, which are always religiously observed

Before describing the very interesting funeral customs of Madagascar, we must mention two ceremonics, one called Fatidra, or blood brotherhood, by which two parties enter into a mutual and solemn pledge of friendship, and the other, whose object is at once to cure certain diseases and to thank God for the cure. It obtains especially in the west and south of the island, and is called Bilo or Salamanga. Patients subjected to this manner of treatment are considered to be possessed by a devil, who must be driven out. In Arabic the devil is called Iblis, which the Malagasy have changed to Bilo; a term employed alike for the evil spirit, cause of all the ill, and for the exorcism. The sufferer is taken out of the village to a large open space, where there has been specially erected a little platform, ten or twelve feet high, ascended by a primitively built stair (see illustration on page 897). At the foot of this there are ranged on the one side all the people of the neighbourhood,

A MALAGASY WOMAN CARRYING HER BABY

The Malagasy women are very fould of their children, and until they can walk the mother carries them on her back with remarkable devotion, working in the fields or attending to her domestic affairs without ever leaving her precious burden, which is supported in a kind of pocket above her hips that she makes with her lamba.

The chamber in which the dead are deposited is below this store creation, and is reached by a long inclined 1 and. The smaller structure above is made of wood, which is often claborately carved

Then he is led into the undst of the cattle and points out with a staff two beasts, one of which becomes a kind of scape-bull, to be held sacred by the man's parents and treated with the greatest care, while the other is at once sacrificed and eaten by those present

Next the patient, drunk with the rum, the noise, and If he reaches the heat of the sun, climbs on to the platform, an operation not without danger the top without too much assistance, it is a sign that God favours him and he will be cured, otherwise all hope is abandoned As soon as he is stretched on the matting which covers the platform a woman, who must have been chaste for the preceding twenty-four hours, serves him with food which she has cooked for him, especially the flesh of the recently-slam bull. If he eats this, or if only he makes a pretence of doing so, it is a sure proof of his speedy return to health and a long life. Then the uproar, the singing and the shouting recommence. The sick man stays thus raised several feet above the ground, often for many hours, while the rest intoxicate themselves with rum and gorge themselves with meat. Lastly he is taken back with great pomp to his hut, where nine times out of ten he succumbs soon after his return. In this ceremony can be clearly recognized the belief in demoniacal posses sion and the idea of exorcism

The burnal customs are particularly characteristic of the Malagasies The rites are not the same everywhere Some tribes hide their cemeteries deep in the forest, among rocks, in desert places, in fact, always away from human sight and contact, others bury their relations at the roadside or even in the midst of houses. The former, who have such a horror of cemeteries, are the coast-tribes, except those of the south east, who are Arab in origin. The latter, who like to have before their eyes the last abode to which they mist come, are the central tribes, especially the Merina and the Betsileo in fact, those influenced by Malay civilization.

The eastern tribes put the corpse in a tree-trimk hollowed with a hatchet, which is closed, very imperfectly, by a roof-shaped covering. This coffin is laid either on the ground itself or else on a stage in the midst of a palisage roofed over with leaves.

The Antankarana make their cemeteries out of natural grottos or between the rocks which are found in the numerous scattered islands along the coast, and in the limestone mountains in the north of Madagascar. The coffins, who colds are frequently adorned with carvings, are placed on the surface of the ground. Some Betsieo and Bara families also make their tombs in the excavations or caveins found in the steep rock-faces of certain mountains in their country.

This tomb consists of a vault, above which is a square of stones a sculptured pillar on the top of which are fastened the beads of oxen killed in honour of the last person interied and lastly (to the right of the photograph) a high stone executed in

The other inhabitants of the island, on the contrary, bury their dead in the earth. The western and southern tribes, the Sakalava, Mahafaly, Antandroy, and most of the Bara, usually cover them with a pile of stones in a regular design. Some Sakalava families surround the graves with posts sculptured with human beings, crocodiles, birds, etc., in a way which recalls some of the cemeteries of Oceania. The Merina dig out a mortuary chamber, over which they usually erect, for the nobles a little house, for the hora (free men) a little rectangular wall, within which they collect stones and often blocks and chips of quartz, with a stone standing up at one of the angles. As a rule the corpse's head is turned to the east

All the Malagasies connect the dead with an idea of defilement. A funeral procession must never come near a king nor the neighbourhood of his dwelling, nor near sacred stones. Those taking part in a burial are bound to purify themselves with ablutions before returning home.

While in some cemeteries inspire deep terror, all have nevertheless a profound respect for the dead and pay genuine worship to them, all desire eagerly to be builed in the family grave. When a Malagasy, especially a Merina, dies away from home, his most aident wish is that his relatives may come, sooner or later, to collect his bones and take them back to his native soil. When the body of a relative cannot be found, the family bury instead his pillow and sleeping-mat, or at least erect to his memory a monument consisting of a slab or post, by the roadside or near his village. (See illustration on page 901.)

Mourners in Madagascar have their hair dishevelled and wear coarse and dirty clothes. They must not wash nor look in a inition of they possess one. Women must abandon all coquettish ideas and repel the world from C as by their wretched aspect (see illustration on this page). As in the East, white is the mounting coloni in Madagascar.

Several Malagasy tribes, notably the Betsileo and Antankarana have the singular and repugnant custom of not burying the dead at once, in many cases waiting for decomposition to take Needless to say, the funeral vigils are far from agreeable, the relations and friends therefore, to make them tolerable, drink rum incessantly, and burn a quantity of incense, tallow, and even leather! The custom, Oceanic in its origin, aims at the avoiding the burial with the bones of any impure Even tribes which have not this practice commonly observe two ceremomes, the first the ordinary interment of the corpse, the other two or more years later, when only the skeleton is left, which is buried in the family grave Sometimes, as in Imerina, the body is laid at once in the fomb, not in a coffin, but wrapped in numerous At a fixed date comes the silk lambas mamadika, which consists in changing bunerals in Madagascar are always accompanied by festivities. Guns are fired in volleys, and often a considerable number of cattle are killed, whose flesh furnishes the staple of the funeral feast and whose heads, with their horns, are religiously deposited on the grave of their late owner. As long as there is food and drink the feast continues and everyone stays.

It might, without exaggeration, be said that a Somah's very existence depends upon the camel, as not only can be live for months on end on the milk of this misayoury beast, but without it he cannot move his hints from one grazing-ground to another

While leading the nomadic life he has little use for clothes; the less he has the better, as life in the thorny bush will soon destroy any elaborate dress. A long sheet of cotton cloth, about seven cubits in length and of double width, called a maro or tobe, is his national dress. The tobe is loosely but elegantly wound about his person during the day, while at night he uses it as a sheet, in which he completely envelops himself from head to foot while stretched out upon the ground. The dress worn by the women is of a similar material, but consists of two portions, one, the longer, which forms a loose and much-planted skirt, while the other acts as a vest or bodice and a hood for covering the head and shoulders. This latter part of the upper portion -namely, the hood -is continuous

The old men usually shave the head, while the younger members of the male community are always afternately shaving then hair off and letting it grow long into a mop, the latter giving them quite a picturesque appearance. then teeth, and this is due in no small measure to the attention they pay them. It is a common sight to see a Somali chewing at a tooth-stick or scrubbing away at his teeth with it (see illustration on page 910). His tooth-brush is nothing more than a small branch, the thickness of a pencil and about the same length, cut from a tree which grows freely in his country. The end of this stick he chews into a brush

While leading the nomadic life every mail, woman and child has his or her allotted task in the ier. They all have to work hard, as only a few days are spent in each spot, and as soon as the flocks and herds have eaten the grass down, away they move to fresh pastures. The men have

The women have to put up the buts and in their spare time make all the component parts, namely, the numerous mats and the framework, letch the frewood and the water, as well as make all the various pots and receptacles for holding the tood water and nilk. The httle boys and guls have to graze the sheep and goats, and it is no uncommon sight to see a small child of seven or eight a long distance away from the rer, grazing quite large heids of goats. The older boys, or the men, always look after the grazing of the camels. It is a very hard life, and only the fittest can hope to survive.

There is no ceremony on the birth of a child, but in most parts of the country a race of outcasts, called Yebirs, exact a small toll from the parents at the birth of a child, and this is invariably paid, as the Somali is very superstitions and believes in the occult practices of this race, and a refusal would be certain to bring harm to the child. In return for the present the Yebir gives the mother a small charm, usually consisting of a minute piece of wood enclosed in leather to hang round the neck of the child.

A name is never—chosen for a child until it is born, as the true Somali names are more of the nature of incknames. For instance, if the child is a boy and is of a pale colour, he is called Bulaleh, i.e., possessor of a dun colour, if a girl and of the same colour, she will be called Bullo. If the baby is of a reddish brown, the boy will be called Askn and the girl Askn ro. If a male child is born during a rain-storm, he will be called Robleh—if under a hot sun, Sudi, if while the carayan is on the move, Gedi, and so on—Nicknames are very common, and most of those who possess Muhammadan names, such as Muhammad, Abdullah, etc., are also given nicknames, by which they are better known than by their real names—Boys undergo the usual Muhammadan initiation rite at the age of five or six, but there is no ceremony attached to this nor to the more barbarous procedure which the young girls have to undergo at a later age.

Courtship may last one month, or be extended over several years. It depends entirely on the amount of the mehr, or marriage settlement, and the rate at which it is paid. It is rare to see a man marrying before the age of twenty. The mehr may be anything from a few rupees or half a dozen sheep and goats to one hundred camels, according to the bridegroom's wealth and the avaricious father's demands. It is divided into two portions, the gabati and the yarad. The former is paid to the bride's father as soon as the amount of the mehr is settled, while the yarad is only paid just before the marriage ceremony. Sometimes the man keeps back a portion of the yarad; but should be divoice his wife soon after the marriage be must make good the whole amount of the mehr. The whole of the mehr is the property of the birde, but the consent of the father is seldom obtained without a small present. If the father changes his mind after the gabati has been paid, he must return it in full, together with any present which he may have received.

The marriage ceremony itself is a simple enough affan. After the mehr is paid, the bride and bride groom proceed to the Qade's house, where, after repeat ing a solemn vow that he will house, clothe, feed, and look after the gnl, and listening to a few extracts read from the Koran by the Qadi, the bridegroom conducts the bride to his house. A small fee of two rupees usually satisfies the Qadi.

On the evening of the day on which the mairriage ceremony takes place an ivar is held, and all the friends of the bride and bridegroom are invited. An ivao consists of singing and dancing, which is started by the bridegroom, who, after giving the signal for the song to commence, retries into his hit with two of his friends and takes no further part in it. The men, singing their gerar, a song made up for the occasion and usually consisting of good advice to both the bride and the bridegroom, slowly approach the hit, and forming a semicicle around the entrance, two of their number step forward and give a dance, called shirbo, which is accompanied by stamping of the feet and jumping in the an, the song being continued the while. As soon as the shirbo is at an end, the girl friends of the bride join the men and the main part of the ivar is begin. Everyone joins in the ivar, a dance in which the dancers go round and found in a circle, clapping their hands and stamping

then feet to the time of a particular chant, until they are exhausted, when refreshments are brought out and handed round and the guests depart. (See illustration on page 908)

It is not correct for the bride to show herself at any time during the festivities. On the whole, a Somali is fond of, and carefully looks after, his wife if she is faithful to him, and if she presents him with children he will frequently not marry a second, although he is allowed four by the Muhammadan law—All Somalis are very fond of their children. Every Somalis a Muhammadan and belongs to the Shafi's sect—Having no written language of his own and being unable to read or write, he knows little concerning his religion save what the Mullahs or priests have taught him, and this merely consists in the constant repetition of certain formula—While leading the nomadic hite, his zeal has to be kept up by the itinerant Mullahs who, though hiving as a rule by themselves in permanent settlements called tarikas, every now and again travel through the country accompanied by a vouth who carries the Koran, which is always carefully wrapped in a cloth case, and a board on which numerous extracts from the Koran are inscribed—These wandering Mullahs can always get a night's shelter and some food at the ros they visit—The Mullahs are easily distinguishable from other Somalis as they wear a different diess.

The Somali in the coloured tobe is using a tooth-stick, made of a small twir the end of which is chewed into a brush. To this habit the Somalis owe the beauty of their teeth

It consists of a baggy pair of cotton trousers which extend to and tighten just below the knee, with a roughly-made shirt, or a shirt and a small tobe, covering the upper part of the body. The headgear consists of a small grass-woven skull-cap round which a turban is wound. Around the Mullah settlements is to be seen the only cultivation in the country, and this is almost entirely millet

Like all nomadic races, and particularly the Arab bedoums, the Soniah is very superstitious. Quite a number of his superstitions date back to his pre-Islamic ancestors. He still believes in the legend of Arawailo and the evil that the spirit of this ancient queen is capable of doing. Mounds of stones close to the track testify to his belief in her and his hatred of her, while on the other hand a pile of dead and dying twigs pulled from the nearest bush or tree denote the respect of the women for their ancient pagan queen, who wished by emasculating most of the male children to raise up in their stead a race of Amazons.

The Somali is a firm believer in the magic of the Yebirs, who are supposed not to die an ordinary death, but to disappear, The origin of the custom of the Yebirs exacting a toll from the Somalis is interesting, as it shows how superstitious the race It is said that there once lived in the interior of the Somali country a man who posed as a Sheikh, and who used to levy a toll on all Somalis watering their flocks at some wells close to his hut. A Sheikh named Bakhadleh, who happened to pass that way, saw the impostor and denounced him, whereupon the impostor, who was a Yebii, challenged the Sheikh to pass through a full near by - The Sheikh refused to do so until the Yebn had done it, and this the Yebir did twice before the assembled shepherds. The Sheikh then ordered him to do it a third time, and while the Yebir was in the act of passing through, the Sheikh prayed that the earth might swallow him This the earth was good enough to do for the Sheikh, but the latter had forgotten that the death of a man means the paying of compensation, which is one hundred camels, and this the Yebn's relations at once claimed. The Sheikh, being a holy man and not possessing any of this world's goods, thereupon ordered the descendants of the Yebn, to compensate them for their loss as well as in memory of the occasion, to levy a toll on every Somali marriage, as well as on all women who gave birth to male children, and at the same time he crused for all ages those who refused to pay the toll. Seldom does any Somali fail to pay this recognized toll. Any Mullah who wishes to deceive can practically make any Somali believe what he likes, and full advantage of this was taken by the Mad Mullah, Muhammad Abdullah Hassan, when he was preaching his jehad. He even went as far as leading paid a blood-feud starts, which may not cease until a large number of both sides have been killed on the system of a life. Frequently, to get on level terms with the other side, they have to resort to murders of the most treacherous and cold-blooded type. A settlement is, however, sooner or later arrived at, and the tribes concerned will hive side by side at peace, but this happy state of affairs seldom lasts long. A stolen camel or a dispute about a woman will often start the ball rolling again and they will very soon once again be at each other's throats.

Somalis bury then dead according to the usual Muhammadan custom. The grave is dug so that the body lies east and west, and at each end, when the grave has been filled in, an upright stone is set. In the interior where the soil is light, graves have to be sub-ounded by a high palisade in order to keep the livenas from digging up the corpses and devouring them.

From "British Somaliland" | SOMALIS ON THE MARCH

The Somalis are a nomadic people, and live on and for their flucks and herds. Their existence might be said to depend on camels, as not only can they live for months on their milk, but without them they cannot move their huts from one grazing ground to another.

Being a nomadic race, each tribe keeps itself quite separate from the others and each respects the others' grazing grounds. There is, as a rule, no recognized head of a tribe, although some of the more important tribes elect Sultans.

The sultanship is not necessarily a hereditary office; on the death of one, another is chosen from the deceased man's relatives, the choice of the elders of the tribe usually falling on the eleverest man, provided he has also got a certain amount of stock. When a new Sultan is elected the only form of ceremony usually indulged in is a diballity (see illustration on page 909). A diballity is an exhibition of horsemanship. Every member of the tribe who possesses a horse or who can borrow one, joins in. A singer is first chosen, and he has to compose a song called a gerar. All the horsemen fall into line, with the singer in the middle and slightly in advance of the others, then he, with uplifted spear, singing his gerar, slowly trots his pony, followed by the others, towards the newly-elected Sultan, who either stands on the ground, or mounted awarts their arrival (see illustration on page 912). The gorar is usually made up on the spot, and consists of the most fulsome flattery of the Sultan. As soon as he has finished his song the singer trots off with his followers to some distance, and then, facing about, they return at the gallop with spears and shields uplifted, all yelling and shricking and bearing their points flanks with their whips or thimping them with their heels, and only pulling their points up within a few feet of the Sultan and his retinue, who get covered with dust from head to foot. Like most savage tribes, the Somah delights in singing and dancing. The Somali composer usually makes up his song as he goes along, and it is little more than flattery of the individual in whose honour it is composed. If he finds that his composition appeals to his friends he will commit it to memory and will often teach it to others, and some of these get handed on through several generations

Games he has little time to indulge in except at the coast towns—the only one played in the interior being a game not unlike draughts—called shah—A hard piece of ground is chosen, swept, and a rough plan of the board rapidly sketched out on it, and here with smah round white stones and dried cancel droppings constituting the white and black draughts respectively, he will pass his spare time playing

In the town of Zeyla, among the Fsa and Gudabusi. Somalis, there is played a game of ball called Ganso or Ga'oso. How, when and from whence it came no one has yet been able to ascertain, but it shows the adaptability of the Somalis and their sporting instruct to have adopted a game which necessitates so much man handling. This, in a face that regarded the rough handling of one man by another, as an offence sufficient to start a blood lend, is extraordinary.

ABYSSINIA. By GEORGE SCHULEIN

ABYSSIXIA presents many points of interest to the student of ethnology. An ancient kingdom of established repute in the days of Homer, who bears record to the hospitality of the "blameless Ethiop," extended to the very gods of high Olympus, home of Prester John, whose legendary personality stamped itself so deeply on the methaval imagination, cradle of Christianity in the heart of Africa from the fourth century onwards, Abyssima now presents the somewhat inclancholy spectacle of a dying culture, while her one-time glories have vanished into something less substantial than the image of the desert

The present population of Abyssinia is nixed. Egyptian, Greek, Iew, Portuguese, Indian, Arab and Negro intermingle, and in the chaos of their conflicting interests and beliefs the old culture dies fast. In the state religion, Christianity, and in Abyssinian Muhammadanism, there are many traces of pagan superstitions and practices to which some of the inhabitants are wholly given up. The worship of the Virgin Mary is so widely extended and forms such a large part of the orthodox religion, that it seems exceedingly probable that it may be derived from the cult of some pagan goddess whose attributes and very existence have been forgotten in this later development of her rites.

All Abyssmians, whether Christian, Muhammadan or Pagan, believe in evil spirits of various forms and shapes, endowed with different powers of malignity. Some haunt dark corners by the wayside, others link in cemeteries; some possess their victims with madness, others inflict diseases upon them, one particularly baneful, known as Lilith, seeks to destroy children in infancy. Against these supernatural agents many devices and charms are employed, of which a few examples are given below

he clothing habitually worn by the Abyssmians is very simple, consisting of a long white shirt, reaching down over the Over the shoulders is thrown the Jiama (shawl), which hangs in deep tolds (see uliistration on page 916). The general effect is strikingly picturesque. The native is highly intelligent, and exercis simuch natural wir in driving a bargain, but he is lazy, and owes many illnesses, even blindness and leprosy, to dut

The women are industrious, tising early, and completing no t of the housework before the appearance of their husbands, they do a certain amount of work in the fields as well occupy an inferior position and have few enjoyments condition does not, however, deprive them of the pleasures of vanity, and they may be said to be even vainer than the Persians - To cultance their natural chains they dye then imger and toe nails red, and show then teeth to greater advantage by painting their gums black. The eyebrows are sharply defined by art and the breast, neck and back are not unfrequently embellished by claborate tattoo designs. Yet their appeal is primarily made to the sense of smell and not to that of sight Scents are lighly valued and lavishly used, so that to a Linopean the effect produced is

The christening is curiously enough celebrated in the case of either sex by the initiation ectemony customary among Minhammadaus. The mother goes alone with the child to the priest, who, after the fechas been paid, performs the operation outside the chirch but usade the fence.

The Gallas celebrate a testival of this nature in Addis Abbaba every seven or eight years, the children being initiated between the ages of ten and fointeen. The elders, who have often come from a very great distance, decorate their leads with feathers, and carry poles to which are attached grahands of flowers and some carry as well the common black leather shields and wear dyed sheep skins over their shoulders and as masks. (See illustration on page 620.)

Much of their time is spent in collecting money to purchase drink to give joy to their festivities and to render the boys less scusifive to the pain of the operation. Some of the proceedings might be described as notons. In one of the dances the incu stamp wildly round in a circle, beating on their shields and shouting.

Among the many purification ceremones which men and women have to observe, one may notice that which takes place should a man visit a house where a woman has given birth to a child. In such a case, he may not enter a church until the child has been baptized and he has been purified by the priest pointing holy water over him.

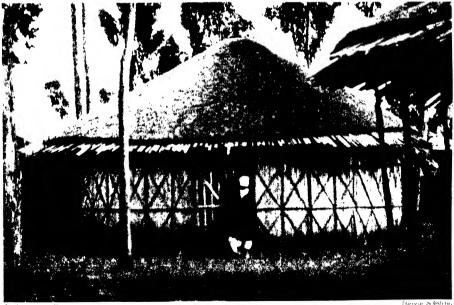

When a death takes place, the friends and neighbours assemble in the yard outside the house of the deceased, the women lamenting and singing a drige. The corpse is laid upon a frame-like structure of wood with carved legs, laced with strips of ox-lide. The algae covered with cloth and carried by four stalwards to the burial ground, where the body is lowered into the grave, so as to face the east. After the functial a feast is usually given. Among the many superstitions held by the Abyssimans the following may serve as examples. To kill a livena is to destroy your good linck, it being believed that these beasts devoire the dead, whose souls continue to live on in the animal's body

Blacksmiths, it is believed, though this superstition is now dying fast, de appear at night up the chimney and are firined into livenas. They are held to be in league with the devil, and no better class. Abyssiman would allow his daughter to marry a blacksmith

Illness is often attributed to the effect of the evil eye. against which children are guarded by being always covered with cotton cloth. The cure for ill-caused by the evil eye is as follows—the flesh and skin of a livena are packed into a small vessel and glowing coals are placed on the top. The nose and mouth of the invalid are then firmigated with the concoction, while he howls like a livera and says "So and-So cast the exil eve on me."

The white eagle is believed to bring great mistortime and is always shot if possible. The bird's liver is cut out and applied by rubbing to a cow's idder. Many cripples and invalids go on pilgrimage to holy places like Sugala and Debra Tibanos, where are hot springs to which lealing powers are ascribed

On the roof of an Abysaman church a cross of metal may be seen, to the four points of which are often affixed the eggs of an ostrich. An old priest gave me the following explanation. The ostrich has to sit on its egg continuously, for the egg, if left, becomes rotten. This should be an example to people to attend assiduously to their religious duties, lest they too come to rot?"

In its origin the religion may have been monophysitic, but its rites have become very confused

Of the many festivals and holidays observed in Abssaum the most important is the Mascal, or festival of the Hols Cross.

The most curious part of the eremonial is when the priests in gargeous robes dance before the kin owing to Jewish and Muhammadan influence, traces of which are to be found in the laws. For instance, the Abyssman, like the Jew, may not eat swine's flesh, nor may game be eaten unless killed by hand. Whenever they shot a gazelle or guinea-lowl its throat was promptly out in belief that death only supervened on the performance of this act. A pious fraud.

Then chief priest is elected by the Patriarch of Alexandria. Priests, with the exception of he who officiates in the Holy of Holies, are permitted to marry, but once only. There are numbers of monks and nuns, but only single men and elderly women are allowed to enter the cloister. These are supported by alms. The priests can write and education is in their hands, but a man may not be educated above his station, and all modern ideas are rigorously excluded from the instruction given. A man who displays any degree of intellectual curiosity may quickly find himself accused of heresy by the ubiquitous priest and cast into prison. A limit is also fixed to the amount of wealth an individual may amass.

The Abyssimans have many holidays during the month, indeed, more fantasias than working days, the following being the chief monthly festivals—the foin Saturdays and Simdays, the feasts of St. Michael, St. Gabriel, St. Miriam, and St. Georgio, on the 12th, 19th, 21st and 2 jid of each month, and the birth of Christ, which is celebrated on the 28th of each month.

They also celebrate important holidays at Faster, Christmas and the New Year (in September), and, shortly after the New Year, the Mascal, in commemoration of the discovery of the Cross — (See illustration on page 921).

The festivities continue over three days. At these festivals some priests carry gold, silver and brass crosses, others, censers, crowns, pictures of the Virgin and Child and Cross-marked silken sunshades. The priests, clad in gorgeous vestments, dance, and many of their dances are of great antiquity, and supposed to be based on the dance of King David before the Ark

INSIGNIA OF PRIESTHOOD

With all these gatties, however, the Abyssmans do not forget to fast, and they observe closely the frequent and severe restrictions imposed by their religion. They fast ordinarily every Wednesday and Friday and throughout the months of March and April. The rainy season, about August, is also a special season of fasting and prayer.

It is not possible to give a full description of the religious life of this country, but enough has been said to show the enthusiasm in carrying out the leasts and fasts of Christianity, whose state establishment is not the least remarkable feature of Abyssmia.

ARCTIC AMERICA By WALTER WOOD

The Eskimos, who have been called a creumpolar people number about 1911y thousand, and inhabit a sical part of the Forthern regions of North America (see map on page 935). They comprise twenty-two different tribes, but the same characteristics are found throughout the inhospitable regions of the Lai North.

These dwellers in a barren, bitter land are essentially a maritime people, and rarely get any distance from the sea from which they wrest a rough and precarious living. Then existence depends primarily on the seal, which gives them food and clothing and provides them with light and fuel. The Eskimos are known as "raw meat eaters," and where civilization has not reached them they remain in the fifthy and digitaled state which has been then lot for many centuries. These Eskimos are born and reared, and spend their lives in encurristances which for hardship and primariyeness have few, if any, equals amongst even the least fortunate of the peoples of the world.

It was formerly believed that the Eskimos were of Mongolian origin, but the accepted theory now is that they may be considered as coming from American Indians. The barsh conditions of Natine which have compelled them to held together have developed a cride and simple Socialism amongst these children of the chase. Tents made of skins form the summer homes of the Eskimos, and primitive houses give them accommodation during the writer. But these structures men and women and children of different families are crowded, and in them the people are born, are ill and die, and from them they are carried to their graves.

More variety is altorded by the winter dwellings than is given by the summer tents. The remarkable harmony in which the Eskimos can live was illustrated by observation of a tribe on the Greenland coast. This tribe comprised from hundred and thirteen persons, who were divided into cleven small communitie. These communities were in winter quarters at different stations, the greatest distance between any two stations being eighty nules. The communities were, in fact, families, for only one house was provided at each station, and in it all the members of the community lived. The highest number of occupants was fifty eight. The community observed numbered of hit families, the total number of persons being thirty-eight, all of whom lived in the one room which formed the house. This room was twenty eight feet long and fifteen feet broad, and in no place was the height more than six and a half feet. A helpe or bench, five feet wide, can along the beel wall of the room. This ledge was partitioned off by means of curtains into eight compartaint, the size of these varying according to the number of persons in the family occupance it

Throughout the long Arctic winter these thirty-eight men, women and children lived in the one room, cating drinding, and sleeping, and anomining and merry-making, act there was nothing in the nature of a Freach of the peace. This anniability and toleration is one of the most notable characteristics of the Lidmo people, indeed they have no word to express scolding, nor have they the equivalent or "war." They are sparing of words, and then language is so compressed that one word will express the meaning of a score of words in other languages.

When quarrels arise the L-kimos have a singular and amusing method of settling them. The man who has a grievance set forth In complaint in a song, and when this has been composed to

BOYS GAMES

The Eskinos are a cheerful people and enter with great zest into their simple games. A party of young people is shown who have been disporting themselves with a sledge, the places of the doys having been taken by children

Despite this casual method of alliances, relationship is highly valued, and there is a strongly developed wish to continue the species with a particular desire for male descendants, consequently, there exists a real regard for children, and the little mortals are treated with a care and kindness that could scarcely be expected from parents reared in such a repressing environment. I rom the cradle to the grave the Eskimo has to fight for his existence, yet everything it is possible to do is done for the children. The youngsters are docide and contented, and rarely know the meaning of harshness or unkindness. Orphans are readily adopted, even when parents have a number of children to provide for a and it seldom happens that these new comers are not treated with just the sime kindness and consideration that are shown to the parents' own oftspring

The buts of summer are replaced in winter by snow houses and houses built of turf and wood and oddments. Into these abodes the Fslimos crawl through a low hole and once inside many of them strip entirely owing to the closeness and wirmth of the atmosphere.

In the matter of dress there is little difference between that of the men and the clothing of the women. Trousers are ceramon to both sexes and the forms of head-dress are practically the same. The men of South Greenland wear a garment called a timiak, made of bird skins, the feathers being turned inward. This timiak has a hood, which is drawn over the head in the open air. Another garment, called anoide, a sort of vest, made of cotton, is worn over the timiak. The trousers are made of sealskin, and the same material is employed for the foetgear, which serves the double purpose of sock and shoc. The combination is called kinnis. These consist of an inner sock, with the fin turned inward, and an outside shoe, made of hardess, watertight hide. Into the fin interior the naked foot is put.

The women also of South Greenland wear a jacket made of bird-skin, but it differs from the men's garment in that it has no hood. Instead of the hood there is a high collar made of black dog slam, outside of which a highly coloured broad necklace of beads is worn. In the cases of both men and women, the wrists of the budskin garments are decorated with black dos -km th women cotton vests being the brightest colonis that can be obtained In some of her apparently hopeless cuviroument, I skimo woman pos server an astomslime amount of temping vanity and mead dition to dominic as much coloni as she can assume, she uses bug htly coloured leather to embroider

This statement has special application to the females, and the quite modern type of Lisking gal is not seldom by way of being very much of a belle, and the children are well and picture-squely clothed. So completely up to date are the more fortunate of them that they are provided with snow goggles, which are also used by the women, especially when they are engaged in tasks outdoor, such as fishing, which require the exercise of great patience. When the women

The han of the Eskinos does not readily lend itself to attractive dressing, though a few of the most comely women manage to give it an agreeable appearance. Black and straight, and exceedingly coarse the han of the men is mostly allowed to grow wild, and sometimes it is never cut. A band or thoug is used to keep the han back from the face. The usual mode of dressing adopted by the women is to knot the han in a tult on the crown of the head. This knot or tuft is a source of very great pride, and the wearer's chief object is to make it stand up as stiff as possible. In the knotting and tying different coloured ribbons are used in Greenland. A red tibbon is worn by unmarried women, but if they have had a child the red is changed to green, this colour being also worn by a widow who has a child. A blue ribbon indicates a married woman and a black ribbon a widow, but frequently old widows wear a white ribbon.

The very nature of the Fskimos' lives makes personal cleanliness impossible. When water is to be had only by melting snow or ice by means of precious firel, it follows that the liquid is used only for essential purposes. The most primitive of the tribes are indescribably fifthy in appearance and habits, and even with the Eskimos of the settlements it is a matter of extreme difficulty to inculcate the observance of cleanliness. Some advantage in the way of cleanliness and comfort is gained by the custom of certain Eskimos, men, women and children, going about in their tents and houses entirely naked. The iniwholesome wainith of the interiors of these dwellings induces the Eskimos to cast aside their clothing in the way described. The enston disappears with the advent of Europeans, but Dr. Nansen considered that this was more the result of affectation than real modesty.

The religion of the Eskimo is a compound of fear and idolatry, but mostly fear, the greatest of

When Eskinios die, then bodies are birried on land or cast into the sea, the particular possessions of the deceased being placed on the beach or by the grave, partly for the sake of getting the things out of the way, so that they shall not act as reminders of the departed, and partly because there is a feeling that the dead person may have use of them in the spirit world, and may have that use when the things have rotted and the spirits have gone to another sphere (see illustration on this page)—There is much sharn grief in connection with the dead, and some of the customs of mourning that have to be observed provide a good excuse for neglecting work

In past years, when death came, it was followed by wrapping the corpse in skins and laying it on the bleak rocks, placing with the body the clothing and simple articles which had been used by the deceased in life, and that state of things still prevails with some of the tribes, but in the cases of the more civilized communities wooden boxes, which are obtained by barter from the traders, are used as coffur-There is no deep binial in the ground, and the exposed bodies or coffin- are frequently found by the 1-kimo does and the bodies eaten, these heree and tayenous brutes having no difficulty in destroying the make-lift coffins. of the United States. The Mexican Indian, on the other hand, being essentially a peaceful tiller of the soil, has continued his vocation in spite of oppression, down to the present day. He is the backbone of the nation, representing more than half the population, and, when educated, will be the preponderant factor in Mexican life.

The old "white" Mexican families whose escutcheon is free from Indian blood are few indeed so that the European inhabitants at best only about one axth of the total population, are composed of foreign immigrants, adventurers and business men, who move across the preturesque stage of Mexican life and add to its bulliancy Then civilization is thoroughly Spanish, as are their customs courtship, marriage, et cetera,

The Iroquois and Arapahoes were warriors and lumters whose fate it has been to disappear as factors in the life

The essentials, with variations and additions, are the carape*, a multi-colonied blanket that serves many purposes, and the rebo*,o*, a broad scarf or shawl of blue, yellow or violet, which is worn over the head and shoulders dropping in graceful folds and, as often as not being caught up over the arm. The Indian women throughout the country go bare-footed, many of the men, however, indulging in twist and hemp sandals.

In matters of this life, the descendants of the Aztecs and Mayas and kindred tribes are frankly materialist, in matters beyond the pale of their understanding, they are both superstitions and idolations. Then religion is nominally that of the Roman Catholic Church, but it is to a very large extent, the continuation of Aztec and Maya lore. Religious processions have been abolished by the Government, but they still exist in the country, in small Indian villages, built of brimboo huts thatched with palm-leaves. And they are quaint, it noisy. A band of drinin and fife, heads the procession, and is followed by the pions (and all are pions), who carry wend cabalishe figures of

Saviour as a child is added to the group, and on the following day the private, a hanging, tinselled jar with streamers, which takes the place of our Christmas-tree, is broken and the presents which it contains are scrambled for by the children

In then relation to each other, the sexes are strangely matter of fact. I refer, of course, to the lower, or Indian and mestizo, class. In the middle and upper classes, the romance of flashing black eyes, seen in a balcony or behind the reja, is identical with the customs of Old Spain, even to the rôle played by the lan, the discreet go between and the patient "bear" twilling his moustache at the street corner, and making wend signs with a cigarette that are only comprehensible to one pair of eyes.

Among the Indians, on the other hand, the romance of life is the outburst of a passion. At fourteen the average girl is already married or mated, for marriage itself is not an essential. Those who can afford it, marry, those who cannot, the then own hymeneal knot. It is time that since the Government has made it a law that only marriage in the registry office is legal, and that Church marriage by itself is illegal, the celebration is within reach of all. But the Indians in their villages know nothing of laws, and believe the cura who tells them that only the vows taken in Church are binding. The result is that, knowing nothing about the one, and not being able to afford the other, the ceremony is apt to be dispensed with. This laxity is partly explained, moreover, by that obtaining in the pre-conquest days, when the act of cohabitation was matself binding.

Apart from this laxity, however, the iimon is in every way a moral one, masmuch as it is not taken by the man as an excuse to escape any responsibility with which he may have shouldered himself. It might as a matter of fact, be more to the point to speak of the woman in these terms, for hers are the responsibilities and the work. She labours in the fields and labours at home, spins the fibre of the again and grinds the coin for the tortillas or flat cakes that are the staple nomishment of the population and are always home made. She does the washing on the bank of the river, looks after the barris, and goes to market, both to buy and self. She squats in her booth, four poles and two mattings, one for her wares and one for shelter from the sun- and sings her wares, the while the man, an inveterate smoker of cigarettes, longges about. The red flag hung out at a shop window tells him where fresh pulque is to be had, and off he goes, perhaps to be joined later by his wife, who smokes and drinks as well as he. Or, instead, she may go to consult the curandera, the wifeh, who plays as important a part in her life as the curate.

There is no antagonism between sorcery and Church to the native mind, one is rather complementary to the other. The sign of the Cross will, to all intents and purposes, keep away the Evil Eye, so will the curandera's potion. Therefore, argues the Indian woman, with both weapons she is doubly armed. Perhaps she is jealous of her husband, and surely the curandera's recipe will render prayers more efficacious. Besides, the witch is more human than numbled Latin, and, an adept in the lore of her race, she touches superstitious chords that have shimbered since Guatemotzin, the last of the Aztec kings, whose memory is wildly fêted each year by the Indians, went on his long journey. Consequently, her sway is an important one, and in her favour be it said that she is learned in the secrets of medicinal plants, as were her forbears, and that, if lives have been lost through her folly, tragedies wrought through her machinations, and thousands fooled by following her ridiculous instructions, many more have had then ailments circle by her simple methods.

Where superstition—and it is naive in Mexico as compared with other countries—thrives, the magicarts thrive also, and Mexico is no exception—The bith of a child—otherwise an immiportant event in the life of an inisport people—is the occasion for the astrologer, amateur or otherwise for the seller of chains that will make the boy a happy man in his time and the girl an uncomplaining mother—The next step is to take the offspring to the church to be baptized—Even if the father and mother are not married the child must be baptized—ost what it may, and peones (na" a labourers) are frequently to be met on the highway with a babe in then arms, on then way to the a arest church. This is the father's first duty—and he never shirks it—As for the mother, she is, as are her kind, passionately fond of her child, especially if he be a boy, and, unless she has a daughter old enough to toddle around with the child on her back, the baby will never leave her, being shing across her back and held in place by the reboto when she works or walks. As soon as the child is able to talk, it is taught a prayer, and gradually the mother imparts to it her stock of traditions and legends, minacles and religion, which go to make up the child's knowledge of the iniscen wonders or the world. With such an education the preservation of old. After traditions and lore is assured for generations to come.

The shadow of death casts but a passing gloom over the Mexican, and the bones of the dead except in cases where special payment has been made to the Church, are not allowed to be longer than a couple of years in the ground. Among the poorer classes the coffin is merely a convenient receptacle for transporting the body to the Campo Santo, and is consequently lined from the undertaker for the occasion. The chanting of a Mass is, however, indispensable, and votive offerings of flowers (instead of candles) to the particular saint of the locality are an essential feature of the mourning criemonies, which include the wearing of black or purple, the servants among the richer classes domining similar garbs of sombre line. In lonely villages, untroubled since the days of the Conquista, Azter rites, it would appear, are indifficed in by the Indians, even to the sacrificing of dogs, clicken, etc. The latter are, together with turkeys, frequently sacrificed in some wend and perhaps disgusting tashion by the witch, the curandera, to counteract the ever dicaded influence of the Evil Eye, the Great Bad One, who is specially active at the time of childbirth and when illness is in the house.

A Ecerada, or amateur bull-fight, is very popular and one is here seen at the foot of Mount Popocatepetl, "the amoking mountain." The correct formal (professional bull-fight), in its stone built arena, is a much more splendid affair, thoroughly Spanish in its brilliancy.

The Mexican's chief amusements are music, suiging and dancing, the almost national dance being the parabe. There are also many mystic dances, a mixture of Church and Aztec lore, reminiscent of the early days of the Spanish occupation. These are danced, with the accompaniment of drinin life, and masks, at stated times of the year, and vary according to locality. In the far away south the danza de la conquista, showing Aztees overawed by the arrival of the white man, is among the most characteristic. The fiestas of the Church, as are the patronyume or saints' days of relatives and friends, are also fêted glechilly by the population—dancing, gambling, cock-fighting and the bull fight being the leading amusements. As regards cock-fighting, the bull-right, and the baraia (cards), all of Spanish origin, they have become essentially national. After the cura (village priest) and the curandera, the agent exercising the greatest influence on the life of the Mexican is pulgue. This national drink is made from the agave, a plant resembling a huge aloc, which, cut at the right time, gives forth a honey-like fluid. Treated with madre de pulque and allowed to ferment for twentyfour hours, it produces a strong-smelling liquor, to drink which the Mexican will spend his last centavos. Too generous libations --and they are frequent, produce a dull kind of intoxication. The pulgueria, where it is sold, is an interesting establishment, and it is here that many a fleeting glance of Mexican life can be obtained by the traveller in Mexico

Mexican potters is deservedly famous, being made of a fine porous class artistically painted by native women in the villages. The eleverices shown by the potters in cutting and shaping their moulds has always excited the admiration of foreign visitors to Mexico.

CHAPTER XL

THE WEST INDIES By CHARLES RUDY

THE peaceful Arawaks and warring Caribs of the days of Columbus have been, with the exception of a few Caribs marooned in Januaca, completely exterminated, their place having been taken by the negroes imported as slaves from Africa from the sixteenth to the nunctionth centuries. These freed negrocs, with mulattoes and creoles, form the bulk of the West Indian populafrom to day. But the step between the savage hordes of the heart of Mirca and the fetish-worshipping crowds of Hayti is a small one, the grotesque and disgusting spectacles of the Congo wilds being repeated in the wooded fulls behind Port-au-Prince Thus it is throughout the West Indies in the more civilized islands. such Jamaica, for instance. where firm administration has been established, the superstition of the negroes is wisely held in check, but the shadow of the obeahman hangs over the island, just as the power of the papalov rules supreme in the Black Republic, and that of the guangatero in Cuba and other islands where the inhabitants speak their Spanish creole

The nuldest form of fetish-worship is, as stated, that obtaining in Jamaica

NOODOO WORSHIP, HAVTI

The tom toms or Voodoo drums, are used in the paran dances at Havti West Indies and their monotonous drumming is often heard at night time

The nominal religion of the negroes is Christianity—But, though outwardly they comply with the tenets of our religion, at heart the African instinct shunbers, and is not dead—This instinct can best be explained by calling it the cult of the fetish, of a charm frustrating the machinations of the evil spirits. According to Jamaican lore a human being possesses two spirits, a good one and a bad one. The former goes back to Africa when a person dies, in view of which a deceased is kissed by his relatives and friends, and given messages to be borne across the ocean—The evil spirit, on the other hand, remains with the corpse in the grave, and emerges at night in the form of a "duppy". It is at childbirth, or at the moment of death, that "duppies" are most active, however, and it is at these times that special precautions are taken to frustrate them. The new-born babe's neck is immediately encucled with a green bead necklace (worship of the green snake?) and mider his pillow are placed an open pair of sersions, representing the "A," and a Bible, he is not allowed to leave the house until the ninth day in case a "duppy" should seize him. After a person's death, on the other hand, all standing water is mimediately thrown away, lest "duppies" settle therein. But the dead man's "duppy" has to be propitiated, and therefore rinn and lood are placed at its disposal, in case it should hunger or thirst.

Christmas is the reat festivity in Jamaica and the native population make the most of it, the women, especially deckins themselves out in their very best finery of face and gold ornaments.

The obeah man is one who, thanks to his superior knowledge of sorcery and witcheraft, is able effectively to combat the evil power of the "duppy". He is conservative in his methods, employing the time honoured system of cabalistic drawings and wend meantations. He goes farther, however, and some of his occupations are to "bottle duppies," set them on the track of an enemy, and to distribute charms—strange mixtures of feathers, hair and plants—among his customers. The obeahnen become dangerons at times, seditions and mirrily, in which case the British authorities watch them closely. Were it not so, matters would soon drift beyond control, and the next step towards Voodooism, as practised in its most debasing form in Hayti, would be quickly taken.

Between both forms of Voodooism, the mild and the acute, there are many variations, according to locality and the administration obtaining on any given island, be it Danish on St. Thomas or Dutch at Curação, French at Martinique of American at Pherto Rico. In the old Spanish colonies, such as

In other words, the Congorities of Voodoorsm as practised in Hayti are not free from the charge of cannibalism!

The scene grows wilder and wilder and more degrading, the loitorchi, or stomach-dance, mitiated by the mamaloy, is taken up by the andience, and a regular orgy of the worst description cusues, and continues until dawn or until, intoxicated with fervour, rum and fatigue, the negroes and negresses fail down on the ground in a heavy slumber. According to all accounts, the greatest of these nocturnal feasts take place at Easter and last for days. Mardi-gras is also the occasion for a riotous carnival, even in broad daylight, and in towns like Port-au-Prince.

In the eistwhile Spanish coloures the tom-tom is replaced by the guitar, but even this musical instrument is placed in such an ingenious manner as to unitate the notes of the tom-tom. What the banjo is to the negroes of the Southern States, the guitar is to the negroes and creoles throughout the West Indies. But as imiscians of the highest order, the creoles of Cuba and Puerto Rico can easily be singled out as preceniment. The musical lore of these islands, full of sentiment and feeling, generally in the minor key, has a peculiar thythin that easily distinguishes it from that of any other country. It is very popular in Spani, where it has been absorbed by the people, and become merged with then own national songs. Dance-misse from the "islands" has also spread throughout the world, and the tango, with its peculiar hip and stomach movements, so widely discussed at the present moment, originated in all probability in the island of Cuba or Puerto Rico, though latterly modified in the Argentine Republic.

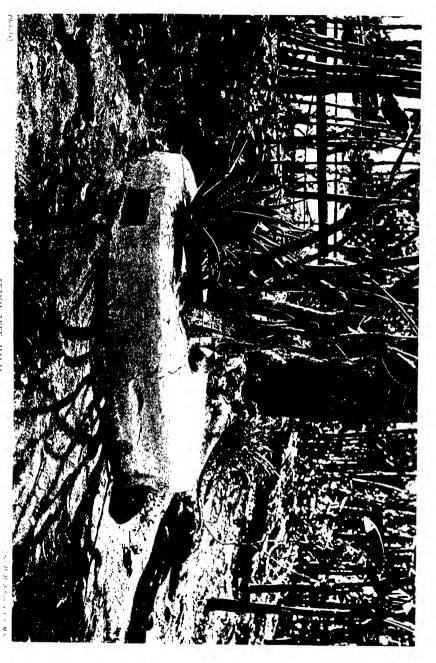

The white population of the islands forms a weak minority, which is practically absent in Hayti and Santo Domingo. In the former only a few white families are to be found in Port-au-Prince, the money-lending class in the Haytian towns is Syrian, popularly but erroneously called Egyptian. In Jamaica, East Indians are being introduced as coolies, and, with their own customs and rites, add to the diversity of peoples and races, and help to make the kaleidoscopic picture of West Indian life more brilliant and exotic. The larger islands have, moreover, a considerable floating population of Climese, engaged principally in Chinese laundries, and in other trades, not less lucrative, but fair more questionable.

The language of the inhabitants of the West Indies varies, as do then customs, according to locality. Spanish, or a modified form of Spanish, is most generally spoken, followed by an incomprehensible pagon of creole French, spoken as far north as Louisiana, where there is a resident French creole population. The English spoken by the natives in Jamaica, the Barbados, Bahamas and in the Leeward and Windward Islands is a picture-sque "pigeon English," generally drawled out with an intonation that is both attractive and catching.

FETISH TREE H \\11

According to the fetish superstition of the nestoes of the West Indies the spirits of the dead inshebit certain tires. They must be propitiated, and in this connection several wild saviage rites are celebrated in the woods of Havit. In Jamaica the cotton tire is and to be a fetish in which case its roots are spirakled with rom to keep away the "duppy."

INDIAN CUSTOMS IN NORTH AMERICA. By R. B. TOWNSHEND

INTRODUCTION

141 North American Indians, or Amerinds, a convenient abbreviation often used by anthropologists,

The Zapotec, still numerous to Osmoo, were a highly civilized and powerful nation in pie-Columbian times. The coil of cloth over the woman's shoulders is twisted to form a head-dress.

form a remarkably homogeneous stock as compared with the various peoples of any -mular area in the Old World probably represent the fusion of successive waves of immugration from Asia, whether by the Mentian Island steppingstones or the Behring Straits ice bridge, which took place long chough ago for the languages they brought with them to have differentiated since then year The immigration must have taken place before man had made the discovery of metals, seeme that when Columbus came most of the tribes were still in the Stone Age. only a few of the more advanced, like the Mexicans and Pernyians, having got so far as the use of bionze It took place before man had done much in the way of taming animals, 111 North America the only domestic animal found by the followers of Columbus was the dog It took place before man cultivated the earth, as the municiants brought no Old World plants with them, but developed for themselves as their staff of life a Central American plant, the maize, and the art of cultivating maize had had time to spread in pre-Columbian days as far north as Cauada and as far south as Chili. Briefly, the Americal immigrants may be described as paleolithic hunters and fishers, of the glacial or possibly pre-glacial epoch, who arrived while their languages were still in a state of flux. So much have the languages varied that the late J. W. Powell, of the American Ethnological Bureau, distinguished fifty-eight distinct linguistic families north of Mexico, and these again are split up into an infinite diversity of dialects. The long ages which made such differentiation possible, although they did not after the fundamental characteristics which make the American an Amerind from Mexico to Canada, allowed of the growth of an extraordinary variety of customs and ceremomes, which often, but not always, follow the line of linguistic fission

BIRTH

AMONG the Amerinds, as a rule, the cradle for the expected child was prepared before birth, the frame being often made by the father and fitted, pidded, and ornamented by the grandmother In the region towards the Arctic buchbark was used for the frame, on the Atlantic side of the country a thin board was the support, and on the Great. Plans a lattice covered with skins, but the Pawnees, a Plants tribe, used a board after the fashion of the Algoriquians and Troquois of the Miss Eletcher says that a piece of this board, supposed to correspond to the heart or life, was taken out, and symbolically the child's life was thus supposed to be preserved, it was also considered important that the cradle-head should follow the grain of the wood, the ornamentation of the chadle symbolized the sky, the stars, and the lightning. On the North Pacific coast a tiny dug out canoc was used for the cradle, and, as on the Siberian coast epposite, this was often suspended horizontally instead of vertically. The basket cradle was in general use both lower down along the Pacific coast and in the Great Interior Basin. The Chinooks of the North West used a special attachment to the cradle, which pressed down the forchead so as to flatten it, and the same thing was done by the Natchez of the Lower Mississippi and a few other widely separated tribes extraordinary deformation thus produced does not seem to have injured the mental capacity of the individual affected, or to have been transmitted hereditarily. In other cases, notably among the Navajos, the pressure of the eradle board on the back of the head produces a lateral expansion that sometimes gives an appearance of extreme brachycephaly, but this is probably accidental. No harm seems to be done by it, certainly, no tribe has better brains than the Xayajos, or rears more children. Indian women are devoted to their babies, but they lose many from ignorance of the best way to rear them. Most of the women are remarkably strong, and can muse then babies

THE DISTRIBUTION OF THE GIFTS AT ACOMA NM

On St. Stephen's Day the Indians of Vorma (who are Christiaus) make offerings at their patron saint's booth-shrine of proches melons and coin chili peppirs and bread. The women wear blankers and suffice increase.

well into their second year, but if the mother is weakly, another woman will give the baby milk This is a matter of great importance, as, except among the pastoral tribes, there is no milk to be had for the children. In this connection one may contrast the state of things among the Navajos, with then immense heads of sheep and goats and the non pastoral tribes - Many of the latter are dwindling, some are verging on extinetion, the Navajos, on the contrary, are doubling their mumbers every twenty-five years, which is faster than the rate of the white population of America But their unequalled success in child-rearing is not only due to the nulk they obtain from their flocks, credit must also be given to the lact that nowhere are women treated with such consideration as among the Navajos

A child is usually given a name by its father or grandfather foin days after birth. Miss Fletcher tells us that the Omahas are divided into gentes, or families tracing through the father, and the name always has a reference to the mythical patron of the gens. Kind treatment of children seems to be muver$d, partly from good-natine, partly that the spirit of the little future warrior may not be cowed or broken. It is rumonred that deformed children are sometimes destroyed, but in 1903 the writer saw a deformed boy among the Hopi of Walpi, who played about with the others and seemed rather to be a pet than otherwise. One of the favourite games among the Omahas is a sort of follow-my-leader. "Fancy some ten or twenty youngsters, the boys under eight naked all but a string tied about their bulging little bodies, the girls in a short smock - each child grasps the belt of the one in front and all start off at a shuffling frot, keeping time to a gibberish chant, winding found trees and among the tents, watching for the chance to snatch an car of corn from some old woman busy with her pounding, and scattermg to cover like partridges when she tries to catch and punish them 'Or sometimes the children make a circle round the fire in the lodge, and the grandfather tells them tales of long ago or sings while the children dance in time to the time. The guls are found of dolls and dolls'-houses, and the boxs have balls and tops, bows and arrows, and shires. It is fascinating to them, as to all children, to imitate the ways of then elders and the elders train the guls carefully in the needful arts of cooking, fire making, and the care of the topee, or wigwain, while the boxs learn the use of arms, to hunt, to trail, and to tend the flocks and herds

Both boys and girls learn the religion and the moral duties of their people, and are proud of understanding them.

We are accustomed to hear of the young men in medieval Europe, who, before they received the honour of kinghthood, bad to watch their arms for a night with fasting and prayer. The probation of boys among the Red Indians was naturally more severe, for it was only the hardest, fiercest and most courageons who could smaye in such a society. The test of courage among the Cheyennes was as follows. When the boy reached the age at which he might become a warrior, his father took him and fastened him to a post set usually near the path outside the camp along which the women went to fetch water. The way they fastened him was this. Parallel meisions were made in the pectoral muscles and thougs of raw hide passed underneath between them, and then tied to the post, the boy bearing it like a Spartan. He was now left alone, and his task was to free himself by making the thougs cut through both flesh and skiii. Most boys leaned back from the post, letting their weight come on the thougs, which drew the flesh out from the chest, and in the course of a couple of days, as it suppirated, the thongs broke through. The bravest deliberately grasped the thong with both hands and sawed it to and fro, till in the course of a few hours they came clear. A boy who thus sawed limiself free was praised by all men, and looked on as a certain leader of war parties in the future. The moment a boy was free, he was taken back to the tepee in high honour and tended with the greatest care, but all the time he remained fast to the post the women came and went quite near him, carrying water, but no one spoke to the boy, none offered him a drink to quench his raging thirst, none gave him help. The boy was quite free to ask for it, and knew that if he did so help would at once be given, the thongs were instantly cut, and he was free. But he knew also that there was a penalty, henceforward he would be accounted a squaw, he must wear woman's dress and do woman's work, he could not hunt, notch less bear aims and be a warrior, and, of course, no woman would dream of accepting him as a husband. To all intents and purposes the boy who failed in the test was turned into a squaw. The penalty was sufficient, the Chevenne boys, almost without exception, hore the cried torture with Spartan fortitude, and parsed.

At the time when the writer remembers the Chevennes rading round the ranch in Colorado forty years ago, it was estimated that there were not more than two or three of these mensquays in the whole tribe. It was a terrible initiation, and those practised by other tribes were searcely less barbarous, but they bred warriors. Yet who can pretend to regret that the United States Government has abolished such things for ever?

COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE

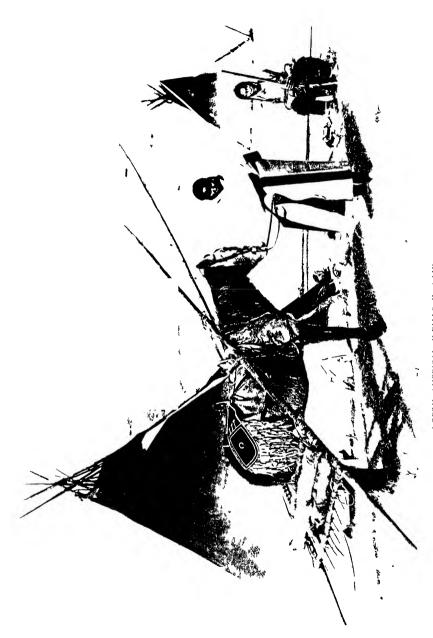

AMONG many of the Indian tribes marriage is not a matter of much ceremony. A chief takes into his wigwam as many women as he can afford to buy with gifts from their fathers and to support

A Pueblo Indian woman carryins on oild, or porous water par of native manufacture. Her cotton bloise and the wrap thrown over her head are of American make, but her woollen skirt and backslain moccasins are native. The par which she has filled at the inquir, by upping with a yourd scoop, may weigh forty pounds.

Sometimes a marriage least is held, sometimes not There is a good deal of polygamy practised among the Blackfeet, for there is much work to do in the lodge of a chief and the first wife is glad to have others to share it with her. But the first wife takes a special position, and is called " thesits beside him wife." of her hus band. It is also obvious that among warlike tribes so many men used to be killed in fighting, that polygamy was necessary to provide for the women left improtected. In 1856 not long after the war in which very many Navajos had been killed the writer was in the camp of a Navajo, rich in flocks, and learned that he had recently taken to himself a third wife, a handsome young woman, of whom he was yery proud But another Navajo later on told Mr. Dee, the trader, that after having emoved the privilege of having six wives, he had now come down to having only one, adding that he was much better off without the other five as they consumed so much corn! The main ceremony of marriage consists in gifts. These are always given by the husband to the parents of the bude, and return presents may or may not be given to him and his parents. In some cases divorce involves the return of the whole or a part of the gifts Where the gifts are made only by the husband they easily pass into a system of simple pinchase and sale. In case of elopement a subsequent payment of gifts is held to remove the disgrace which would otherwise attach to the family. The one all-important law concerning marriage is that every man mist marry outside his clan, and usually outside the gens. Sometimes they even mairly outside their own nation, as there is a clan among the Navajos known as the Ute, which has an historical origin, being derived from Ute women, whom the Navajos obtained by purchase from the Utes on account of their skill in basket making (Cathii). Among the Blackfeet marriages are arranged by the parents, as if is not customary for unimarried girls to associate with men. When the girl's parents have decided on a son-in-law, the proposal is made by an offer from the father that his daughter shall carry food to the young man's lodge. If the chosen man agree I, the girl did this for a whole moon, during which time her father instructed her in the duties she would soon have to undertake as a wife. Then a feast was arranged to take place in the young man's lodge, to which only his relations were invited. Mother and daughter then carried the food to the door, the girl cirtered alone, and without a word being spoken, took her seat at the bridegroom's right hand and distributed embroidered moceasius to all his guests. After the feast, presents were exchanged, and the gul's mother made a new lodge for the young people, immshing blankets, buffalo robes, a buckskin diess for the gul, and a buckskin suit for the young man. The Blackfoot gul in marrying leaves the clan of her parents, and she and her children become identified with her husband's family. It is proper for her mother only to visit her during the son in-law's absence, for if the young man appears unexpectedly in her presence, the breach of etiquette is so embarrassing that he has to make amends by giving his mother-in-law a horse.

A pretty mode of courtship is practised among Indians, where the girls are allowed to have some choice. The young braves, wrapped in their blankets, wait outside the wigwam till the girl appears.

Then the young lover tosses the corner of his blanket over her head, if she dishkes him, she cries out, and he instantly releases her, and another tries his linek. If the grif likes the young man, she allows him to pull his blanket completely over her, and they go off and sit down together and talk, all the passers by taking it as a matter of comse

Among the Hopi the guls wear then han in great whorled puffs on each side of then faces, symbolizing the flowers of the pumpkin, the emblem of chastity, the married women braid it in long plants which are held to represent the fruitful ears of corn. Both Pucbles and Navajos looked down on the Utes, who bought then wives and used them as drudges, a contempt which was returned with interest by the Ute warriors, who despised the others as men who worked, indeed, it Utesbraye boasted to the writer in 1870. "Ute no work. Ute fight, kill mer." Since then the Ute brayes have nearly become extinct, while then red brothers who work are steachly increasing

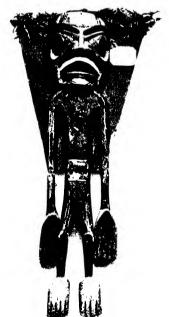

PHIGION

110 North American Indian believes in a world of spirits co-existent with and inderlying the material world reyealed to him by his five senses. The spirits are everywhere in earth, an, fire and water, and in all that the four elements contain. To give a single instance, the writer once tried to buy a new bow from a Navajo, who had just made it and had killed a deer with it first shot. but no, the Indian would not sell, his new bow, though plainly his handiwork, now possessed a spirit of its own, and the first shot having satisfied the maker that it was a spirit friendly to limi, he would not risk parting with it Similarly a white man might refuse to part with a favourite gun, feeling that he never could shoot so well with any But the mental attitude would be cutricly unlike The white man, not being an animist, would say tinly that his gun in weight, bend and balance suited him perfectly A similar explanation might equally apply to the Navajo's bow, but he would not see it in the same way recognize the good qualities of the bow, its perfect taper, its stiffness, its elasticity, but behind them he divines in the bow an incorporeal being with feelings not unlike his own, able and willing to help (or to hurt) him has no life, the Indian's bow is animated by a living spirit Imagine the whole world around you thus peopled with mnumerable spirits whose attitude to you is of quite incalculable importance, and the fact that the red man is intensely religious needs no further explanation.

of all the mysterious powers behind the material world. and as Kitchi Manitore, or Great Spirit, it is taken as equivalent to God - How far the idea of there being one Great Spirit embracing in himself all the rest, is due to Christian doctrines having been introduced by mission aries and passed on from tribe to tribe it is hard to But the idea of one Great Sprit is undoubtedly widespicad, and the more highly developed the tribe, the more clearly they define it - Yet their Great Spirit is not always as good as he is powerful. The Sauks and Foxes, in their claborate creation myth, describe Kitchi Mainton as ready and even anxious to slav his own sons when they seemed likely to become his rivals He was punished by exile, and now he lives in a lodge on the shores of the White River of the sky which we call the Milky Way surviving son Wi-sa ka went through the usual adventimes of a Cultime Hero. So as a punishment he set the whole Buzzard people to navvy work, digging out valleys and planning river-beds, to prepare the earth for the people he intended to make. Also, from that time the Buzzards have lost their beautiful colours, and are hated and loathed by everybody. Then Wi-sa-ka formed mankind out of red clay, and taught them ceremonies and dances, how to hunt, and grow corn, and all things necessary for their happiness. Then he bade them farewell, telling them he was going to the North, to build him a lodge among the snow and ice; but he would revisit them every year in the first snow-shower, and one day he would come again in his own shape in youth and beauty, and would take them away to the happy land in the West, where his brother tuled over the spirits of their ancestors, while he himself would return and destroy the world from which he had taken them. This expectation of the return of the hero is almost universal among the Indian tribes. As in mediaval Europe men dreamed of the return of Arthur and Charle. magne and Barbarossa, so the writer has seen, morning after merning, the Pueblo Indians standing on the flat roots of their houses, wrapped in their blankets, watching for the dawn which might bring back to them the departed Deliverer, who is sometimes identified with Montezuma Peru, Mexico, and Yucatan to the luinting-grounds of the Far North the Indians look for the return of the semi-divine bero who taught them the arts of peace and war. In most cases the hero was not as benevolent and just as the Sauks' Wi-sa-ka, the Indians made their gods in their own image, and their hero was too often a very Indian in his vices and his virtues. Brave, patient and resourceful, he is also cruel and revengeful, he moulds the face of the earth and creates men for his own convenience, or in idle caprice, and he does them good turns by mere accident. Covote is a being of supernatural powers as well as a slinking little wolf, but the Navajo and Pueblo stories in which he figures, though they may explain the origin of various orders of beings, or of customs, have nothing editying and little that is amusing about them

Naturally every tribe modified its traditions, as they were handed down from one generation to another some incidents were forgotten or misunderstood, and as then own modes of life changed, so also the supernatural beings in whom they believed changed to meet the new exigencies. The Navajos, a toving, pastoral people, owned no head clinef, and their spirit world was as democratic as then own society. They believe in many powerful spirits, as the sun and the storm, who must be propitiated, but there is no supreme rule. It is interesting that the most important of these spirits is feminine, Estsanatlelii, "the woman who grows young." Possibly the idea was derived from Nature growing old every year and being renewed again every spiring, but whatever the origin of the behel, it has very interesting moral results. This spirit, who is also known as Whailahay, is supreme in the world of the departed, as she guards the fords of the river which must be crossed to reach the happy himting grounds or pastine grounds of the spirits. Whailahay is true to her sex, and any Navajo who has ill treated a woman has very little chance of crossing the river to the paraches of his people. So the women among the Navajos, unlike the patient dridges of the wilder tibles, take a very important part in the government of the people. We have already noted the astonishing way in which the tribe has increased during the last forty years and it can hardly be doubted that this is the practical result of the behef in Estsanatlehi.

Spirits of whatever sort or sex are most often to be propirated by ceremonial dances. Previous to a dance Indians usually undergo a purification by a long sojourn in the sweat-house or by fasting, after which they come out, stripped and painted, decorated with masks and beads, with 'ox-tails and green garlands, and they dance in slow, soleum order, calling on the spirits to grant them suishing or showers fertility or successful hunting.

Among the Pueblos masked dances usually are employed to invoke the help of the ancestors of the tribe while those in which maize meal or pollen are scattered naturally are intended to appeal to the harvest spirits.

Shanians, or priests make prayers and chant religious songs They also offer sacrifices to the unseen powers, beads or feathers, or eigarettes painted in certain official patterns Then most curious act of worship, however, is the construction of sacred pictures in said which is spread on the floor of the mediemclodge. The pictures are made on the smooth sand by the addition of certain colonical powder-, and of white, vellow and red sand, arranged in the traditional designs as portraits of the gods. The pollen from corn or corn-meal is -cattered as an oblation over the figures drawn, and it anyone is sick, pinches of the sacred sand are adminitered as a medicine, a pinch from the pictured feet for a lame toot, or from the head for a headache Afterwards, what remains of the picture is swept out into the dust

When Mr Walter MacIntocl was adopted by the Blackfeet as White Weasel, he was allowed to see the contents of the sacred Bundle of the Beaver Medicine, which was opened with the most religious reverence. The contents were chiefly skins of different animals and birds, and as each was taken out a dance was performed representing the movements of the animal. Then, again, a man and woman executed a graceful dance with arms extended to represent a duck flying, or bellowed and pawed the ground like buffaloes. The representation of each animal was accompanied with the noise of rattles and chanting of hymns. Then the medicine-man, his face decorated with a black spot on the forchead to represent a thinderbolt and yellow zigzags for lightning, prayed. "Great Spirit,

Then tradition is that one of their beople was given the Medicine Bundle by the Beavers who also taught limit many mysteries, and as they collected more sacred and powerful objects they were added to the Bundle. The last time that Miss Alice Fletcher visited the Omaha Indians, for whom she has done so much, the High Pri st came to her with much solemuity, and said, as they had decided to adopt her religion and behels, they wishe is to give her their Medicine Bundles, which she has placed in the Peabody Museum.

We have already seen how on the spiritual side the totem stood for the highest development of religious technig. But religion has also its strictly practical side —man, the limiter and fisher, looks to the spiritual powers to give good limiting , it is they who can bring the bullado and the deci within arrow shot for him, and he evolved a whole system of magic performances by which they may be induced or compelled to do as he wants. Hence come the vastly important series of dances done for the beaver, the bullado, and the other animals. But when the era of cultivation of the soil was reached, then the dances in honour of the maize took precedence. Its discovery, as we have seen, was made very early in Central America, and no doubt as a consequence, many normal tribes abandoned the wandering for the sedentary life. Maize was known to the chif-dwellers, as at occurs in their caves and in ancient Pueblo mins, indeed, several different varieties had been already developed in pre-Columbian days. The dwarf blue variety seen among the Hopi was probably evolved to suit then peculiar conditions of Lite seasons and scanty rainfall. As in the Old World, Ceres gave to man, instead of acoins and mast," the fat can of coin," so in the New World the gift of corn has a sacred origin, different myths ascribe it to different culture heroes, and corn-meal and coin-pollen are the most acceptable offerings to the spirit powers. The various colours of corn are held to be of sacred and mysterious importance. Corn may be found with ears white, blue, red, yellow, black and spotted, and every one of those colours can be seen in the feathers of the turkey, who was the pet and companion of the first Navajo culture hero. Also, the points of the compass are given the same colours, as blue for the south and yellow for the west. The different spirit worlds above and below the earth, again, have these distinguishing colours, and in the Navajo dances only a woman may bear yellow coin, while white belongs to the men.

One of the most interesting ceremonies practised by the Indians to procure fertility to their fields is familiar to all readers of Longfellow's poems. We remember how Hiawatha bade his bride bless the corn-fields.

The part of the men in obtaining good harvests is usually by clancing. Practically all the dances are intended to bring rain and fertility. The Onondagas, who are some of the most thriving and cultivated of the Iroquois nations, still believe in the efficacy of dances. The New Year or White Dog Feast consists of dances, both for children and then elders, done in honour of the four persons who made the first revelation to their prophet, of the Holder of the Heavens, and of the Thunders On the last day a gambling game is played with peach stores the men staking against the women, and if the men win there will be a good season, for it means that the stalks and cars of coin will grow tall and long like the men instead of being short like the women.

The designs done in coloured earth on bods and limbs are symbolic, as is also the pattern of the kilts. Rattles of the hoofs of a deer or the shell of a small tortors are tied to the knee. The unbound hair is strictly ceremonial.

The Planting Feast comes in May, the Strawberry Feast when the berries are ripe. Later, follow the Green Beau Dance and the Green Corn Dance, and the Thanksgiving Feast in October - It would be unpossible in the present space to describe many of the ceremonal dances peculiar to each agricultural tribe some are clearly symbolic, others like the gambling of the Onondagas approximate to sympathetic magic

The writer saw actual sympathetic magic practised by the Pueblo Indians to break up a drought. The young men, stripped, galloped their points up and down the streets of the village, while the women on the flat roots of the houses deluged them with water from their big carthen pairs. It was not at all a solemic ceremony, but a matter of laughter and joking but the rain came?

The importance everywhere attached by the red men to the smoking of tobacco was, and is, highly significant - Smoking is not only a pleasure, it is also an invocation of the dettes Among the Hopt the pulls of smoke ceremonially emitted by the Snake priest towards the cardinal points are symbolic of the rainclouds he wishes the gods to send them — The Puna of Arizona, before going to war. made ceremonial cigarettes, of tobaccom a reed cover, bound with a cotton or agave fibre band, called the blanket Every brave smoked these to the cardinal points, to the fetislies, and to his weapons, after which the ends were deposited in the shimes. Tobacco was also used to cure disease, bring good linek, and ward off danger. The Calumet, or "pipe of peace," has passed into a proverb. The Crows, before planting, have a solenin procession and a foot-race, they plant the seed and fence it in , then they have a sweat bath, a solenin smoke and a feast. The pipes used by the Indians were straight or bent, and made of stone, bone, wood, or clay. They were often carved into grotesque shapes, especially by those of the North-West Coast, and were richly ornamented. Highly valued were pipes from the famous quarry at Côteau des

Coloured sand is taken into the Kivas, and sand altars are laid of it, as among the Navajos, in an elaborate mosaic of traditional pattern and religious significance, and found, the altars are set up sacred emblens and fetishes. A magic liquid is browed of herbs and honey and corn-pollen, and a sacred pipe is smoked ceremonally to the cardinal points. The Hopi reckon these as six north-west, > south-west south east, north ca-t, zenith and nadir, and each point has its special colon, and doty. When the hunting for the snakes begins the Snake priests issue forth with hair unbound, and naked, save for a long cloth and moccasms, they carry snake whips, which consist of two or three eagle feathers fied to a handle, a long digging-stick or hoe, and a leathern bag Snakes of any sort, except water snakes, are sought for, and when they find one, if he is venomous, they brush him with a snake-whip, which seems to have a sort of hypnotic effect on him and keeps him from striking Then they catch him by the neck, or if that is

The bags, some of which may contain several snakes, are then brought to the Kiva, and the snakes are transferred by skilful hands to large carthenware receptacles. In the Kiva they are kept for the rest of the inne days, during which they are handled freely by the priests, bathed in a sacred bath, rolled in sacred com-meal, and literally wallowed in the sand mosaic of the

be satisfied. And then after that it shall mature, and we shall gather it in and put it up in our houses, and after that we shall cat and live on it. Therefore we are happy, and being strong, shall perform the ceremony." Sixteen traditional songs are sing recounting the clan legend. Long ago, before ever the Hopi had a Snake clan, a Hopi youth named. Five went to the rim of the Grand Cañon, and there he saw the great Colorado river for ever pouring into it, and yet the chasm was not full. So he built an ark and floated down the river till he came to the salt sea and to an island in the sea. There he met the Spider Woman (who is also the Earth goddess), and she was kind and took him over the sea on the rambow bridge to another land. There she brought him into the Kiva of the Snakes, snake skins him on the wills, but the people in the Kiva were Indians like himself. He was told to look aside, and then, loot the people had put on the snake skins, and they were snakes. The Spider Woman helped him to win a maiden of these snakes, Tenamana, for his bride, and after many adventines the pair reached the Hopi youth's country in safety. And from that pair the Snake clair of the Hopi are spring, and therefore it is that they can deal so freely to-day with their brothers, the wild snakes of the sage-brush and the mesa, and persuade them to carry their prayers for rain to the world of spirits.

more priest than doctor. His efficacy depends on his ability to drive out the cyil sprint that causes sickness, and to summon the aid of the good sprints who may (if they will) restore the patient to health. However, some medicine-men, while carrying on their absurd minimizers for the sake of effect, have always been sharp enough to use real remedies, quite often successfully. The medicine-man's position was apt to be exciting, not to say perilous. A medicine-man who was the father of Onray, afterwards head chief of the Utes, had the ill-linck to have an important patient die on his hands. He was accused by the friends of the patient of having done it on purpose, and in their anger they fell upon him and his family and slaughtered them out. The sole survivor was Onray, then a boy, who fled and took refuge with the Mexicans, where he was adopted and educated by an Indalgo. When the boy went back to the Utes later on as a grown man, the education thus obtained was the lever through which he became head chief of the tribe. Ouray's father, however, was more unlucky than most medicine-men, who, as a rule, can invent a dozen good reasons for the patient's death, and boldly claim that but for them he would have died much sooner

When death has actually occurred the Indian behef is that the departed spirit has gone to the spirit world, which is everywhere about its, but of its exact destination and its fate there there are endless views. Speaking generally, the after-life is regarded as an existence not inflike that lived on the earth, but under happier conditions. "Hope springs eternal in the human breast," and in spite of his troubles, and they are many, the Indian's heart tells him that he may yet be blest. We have already alluded to the Navajo behefs concerning the hopes and fears for departed sprints. The position of the Pueblo In lians is far more advanced, in fact Christian teaching must consciously or unconsciously have influenced the old dying Zuñi man, who said. "To dwell with my relatives, even those whose names were wasted before my birth, is that painful to the thought. A man is like a grain of corn—bury him and he moulders, yet his heart lives and springs out on the breath of life (the soul) to make him again as he was."

When the old Zuñi man had drawn his last breath, we learn from Mr. Cushing that the women of his own clan bathed the body and broke a vessel of water beside it, thus renouncing all claim to him and returning his being to the Sim. Then four men carried the corpse rolled in blankets to the ancient burial place, aimld the wails of the women, and lowered it into the grave, while one standing to the East said a prayer and scattered meal, food, and other offerings upon it. Four days later the mourners sacrificed, with beseechings in the name of the dead, the beautiful prayer-sticks plumed with pariot feathers that they hold in such esteem. The niibucky creature made off as fast as it could. when the whole family followed it about the room, behind the grinding troughs, and into every dark corner, praying and scattering cornmeal over it. Cushing asked why they did not let it go er at least give it some wat r, or it would die . since departed from this life, dwell in the country reached through the Lake of the Dead, spending then time delightfully with songs and dances, and there all men are brothers Probably at one time the Zunis believed that their dead literally changed into tin tles, and their more spiritual present yiew may be comparatively modern

The North American Indians practised many forms of burial, including carth, aerial, and min burial, as well as cremation. A usual form was to dig a found hole in the ground and place the body, wrapped in a skin or cloth in it perpendicularly, the legs being doubled up and fiel together The pit was sometimes fined with stones. When a full-length grave was due the body was usually placed horizontally. though it was sometimes laid on the side with the knees drawn up. The prone position was very fare. When burial took place in a chamber in a mound, it was not unusual to interseveral bodies together. Sometimes the body was laid on the ground and heavily coated over with clay, and a me binh over it so as to harden the clay into a protecting shield, and finally the clay coffin was covered with earth. Some of the tribes along the southern part of the Atlantic coast embalmed then dead and made them into minimizes

Out on the Great Plans acrial burial was frequent. The coupse was carefully swathed in the clothes it had worn during life and placed on a frame or litter. This litter was then set up either in a free or on posts, so as to raise it some ten feet above the ground secure from wolves and dog-

Along with the corpse were placed his weapons - broken - so that they might serve him in the next world, together with food for his journey - On the North Pacific coast canoe-Indians used a canoe set on posts instead of a litter - Urn burial was rare, but cases of it have been found in Arizona, where cremated remains had been deposited in an earthenware vessel. In Anzona the Navajos who have a great dislike to touchure a corpse sometimes fastered ropes to the lower ends of the poles of which their hogans, or winter houses, were built, and pulled them outwards, so that the house fell upon the body The fallen house then became the tomb, or sometimes fire was applied, and the whole thing reduced to ashes. In 1903, Mr. Spader, Indian trader at Pueblo de Jemez, N.M., gave the writer a full description of the burnal of a Navajo who had

The dead man's brother took the body into a rocky canon, whither his squaw brought his clothes and his gear, and gave them to the brother, who fell upon everything with a sort of firry, cutting and slashing with a kinte or tearing to shieds whatever could be cut or torn, and he set the shards by the corpse, then he took the dead man's gun and leaned it against a rock, and heaving up a great stone as big as he could hit he smashed the stock to flinders and bent the barrel, he broke the dead man's bow and arrows and fluing them on the pile, lastly, when enough had been given to the dead, the family brought stones in their hands, and the brother piled them up over the dead and his belongings till he had built a caun higher than himself. Then he made a fine before the carri, and taking off all his own clothes he burned them to get ind of the pollution, and the dead man's squaw brought him water, with which he washed himself all over and their pouned the water of pollution on the cleansing fine. Then he leaped with long steps to where the squaw had set out fresh clothes for him, and put them on quickly, and finally he fled from the spot as if pursued by demons. So great is the Navajo dread of anything that has touched a corpse

The signs of mourning varied from tible to tribe, but such world-wide expressions of it as weeping and wailing and rending the clothes, and casting dust on the head, were general among the Ludians. So also were cutting the survivor's face and hinbs, as well as destroying the property of the deceased, as we saw at the Xayajo burial. The Hopi wash the dead body previous to burial, and the proper Hopi moccasin has to be placed on the feet by a priest of a certain claim to ensure a good journey to the kindreds in Shipapin. Professional mourners are employed among the Hopi, Zinhi, Mohayes, and other south-western tribes. Guests at the funeral were hospitably entertained. Among the Dacota Siony a widow had to light a fire for four nights on her husband's grave and keep it burning all night. She had to wail at sunrise and sunset, and observe a partial fast and seelude herself for a period of varying length. When the period was over, the dead man's family fitted her out afresh, and she was free to marry again.

CHAPTER XLII

SOUTH AMERICA By DR THEODOR KOCH-GRUNBERG (Professor of Freiburg University)

INTRODUCTION

It is an undoubted fact that the natives of South and North America belong to one common race, in spite of a great variety of physical divergence. In the two halves of this mighty continent we find an extraordinary multiplicity of type, mainfesting itself in all soits of physical characteristics. It is quite common to find members of a tribe showing a marked resemblance to the Asiatic race, especially to the Mongols, Indonesians and Polynesians, and, again, others of the same tribe who in physique approximate very markedly to the finer and more delicate Cancasian.

There is a great difference in the stature of the different tribes. The tallest tribes are the Tehnelches or Patagomans, and the Bororo Indians, a hunting tribe living in the forests or Central Brazil. The ham is usually cearse, aluck, and of a shiny black, but in some tribes are to be found persons having han time in texture, wavy, or c en crinkly and curly, and that without any possible trace of mixed blood. The han of the South American Indian is more of a brown colour in children often reddish, especially in reflected sunlight. One seldom meets with grey, and hardly ever with white han, even in the very old. Han on other parts of the body is very sourty, and in many tribes is carefully removed when it does appear.

Many of the men wear capes much of strips of the leaf of the Inary palm.

The development of some tribes has taken a different shape from that which would m normal enermistances have been the case, owing to the introduction of things belongmg to our European civilization. Thus the hunting titles of Clinic and of Southern Ar gentina have become intropid horsemen owner to the noro duction of the horse the Goajiro of the pennisula of that name (between Vene zucla and Colombia: have become cattle owners and cattle breeders

The weapons used in hunting are usually magnificently ornamented bows and arrows, but among some isolated tribes

we find also darts and spears, for thrusting or for throwing whose heads have been dipped in poison. These are also used in war. In addition we have in the west and north the blowpipe with its poisoned arrow, and among the horsenien of the south the lasso and the bolas. Then favourite weapon of attack is the clib, of which there is to be found a most wonderful variety as regards shape and size, and next in favour is the bow and arrow, while for defence they have shields of wood or of the skin of the tapir, and suits of armoin made of the skins of animals or of woven fibres of the palm-tree.

The forest tribes seldom engage in open warfart and with them consists mainly in sudden simprise attacks without any preliminary declaration of war of in a night attack upon some peaceful village, whose misuspecting inhabitants are slanghtered in their sleep. It is otherwise in the great plants of the south, where the restless equestrian tribes are possessed with a most warbke spirit, and where they for continues successfully prevented the advance

There is not much to say about the native dress. We can hardly speak of it as *cloth*ing in our sense of the word. It is very scanty, and there is no doubt whatever that the little there is of it was not in the first place assumed for reasons of what we are accustomed to term modesty In many tribes both men and women wear nothing at all. In others the dress is merely an apron of bast, or of linear which has been made by Europeans In Guayana the women wear tiny aprons made of bart or of cotton interwoven with seeds or glass beads. In some casethe climate or other causesuch as the mosquito pest drives the Indian to clothe lumself with garments or robes of some soft fibre woven stuffs, or skins

One of two strange customs of the forest tribes amount to wilful bodily deformity For instance the men of Umana in the basin of the Upper Yapura wear a sort of guille of back, which is very face painted over with designs m red. This they lace as tight as they possibly can round breast and body so that the flesh is all someezed out and bulging warstcoat they never lay aside till it becomes im possible to wear it any longer, and a new one has become a necessity. We might here mention also the bandaging of arms and legs with cotton or fibre bandages—a recognized tribal mark among the Caribs—which is said to strengthen the muscles, and to be practised for that purpose—The monstrons swelling of the muscles thus produced caused much amused amazement among the early discoverers of the Caribs Islands.

The majority of tribes piece then faces in different places, most frequently in the nose, car and lower lip. Here they wear wooden or bamboo sticks of varying length, rolled-up leaves, or on high days the hollow bone of some small bird thrust through with feathers. In the under-lip they were a peg of wood or guin, of stone or metal. Sometimes the result of these adornments is that a huge open hole is made, and the ear lobe is seen hanging down on the shoulder, this is especially noticeable among the Botokude. The Miránya on the Yapina wear pegs of this kind, or mussel shells, in the nostril as tribal signs. This custom was at one time so exaggerated, especially among the women, that often the nose-rings had to be hung up over the ear in order to get them out of the way! The Omagna on the Upper Amazon, and some tribes of the Ucayah, used to press the skull bone of newly-born infants out of shape by means of pids, bandages, and little shps of wood—a custom due no doubt to the influence of the ancient Peruyanis.

Lattooning is rarely met with, and is always a tribal distinction. The women of the Kadiuco people in the southern part of Matto Grosso were formerly accustomed to rattoo themselves all over the body in delicate Arabesque designs—but they have discarded this mode of adornment in modern times for the more easily effaced decoration which can be applied with paints.

All over the continent the custom of painting the body is prevalent, and at first glance it does quite as well as clothing! When one sees an Indian whose whole body is painted over he thinks he sees a man dressed in a coloured knitted suit! The natives paint themselves for every ceremonial occasion, for their feasts and dances, when guests are to be received, and so on. Young people do it nearly every day, and there are genuine dandes to be met with who spend their time in inventing new patterns and who spend just as long over their toilet as a young lady getting diessed for a ball.

CUSTOMS RELATING TO BIRTH AND CHILDHOOD

This whole life of the South American Indian is made up of manners and customs which at first sight appear to us merely strange and emious, but which have then own deep significance. Even before he comes into the world at all, the child is surrounded by both parents with the greatest care. They maintest this care chiefly by restricting their diet most severely. Both husband and wife refrain at this time from cating the flesh of certain animals. Both live chiefly on vegetables and fruit. They observe this care in order that certain cyil qualities of these specified animals may not pass into the child, which is a part of their own being. According to Brett the Caribs of British Guayana never eat certain dishes for some weeks before the confinement of their wives. If the father car the flesh of a little quadruped the child will be lean and thin, if he car a certain little fish, it will be blind, if a wild boar, it will have a snout, it a particular bird, it will be dimb

The child is brought into the world either in the house of the parents or in a hint standing apart from others, or even just outside in the forest under the trees. The birth is presided over by the hiis band's mother, and often takes place in the presence of all the married women in the village.

Men are not present in the inajority of tribe, not even the father of the child. Among the people of North-West Brazil, and in Guayana, where they live in big claus, the part of the house belonging to the family concerned is separated from the rest with mats. Sometimes charms are recited in order to make the birth caster.

the lives of both parents are regulated by severe rules. The young mother must remain in retirement during five to ten days, and her hiisband must bear her company. Neither is allowed to do any work, and then diet consists of light dishes made of manioc roots and baked ants. Any infringement of these prescribed regulations would injure the newly-born, for it would be just the same as if the child itself ate flesh, fish, or vegetables. These restrictions as to his food apply in some tribes to the father for several months—among the Ipurma on the Purus for a whole year.

Among the Laulipang the parents are not allowed to work for three or four months after the completion of the ten days' confinement following upon the birth of the child. The woman may carry the drinking water but she may not do any cooking. This is done by the grandmother She may also not work in the plantation. The man may not touch axe, nor knife, nor make any arrows, nor shoot with a bow lest he "cut_hit, or shoot the child in the head"."

A strange custom is that of the ℓ -our ade, common to many of the South American tribes. During some days, in some cases immediately after the birth of the child, the wife takes over her domestic duties, and the man retires into the room of the new born baby, which he has to muse and tend while manifaming a strict fast. Karl von den Steinen explains this custom as being the outcome of the Indian's belief that the child, be it girl or boy, is to a certain extent, the "little father," being a veritable part of the father finiself. The father is the one who has begotten the child, and without him he could not be at all, thus he is, in truth, a piece of his body. He feels himself one with the newly born. Thus all harmful things that the father receives into his body pass from him to the child. According to Im Thurn, the Makuschi in British Guayana hold that the child actually suffers huit when the father neglects certain rules of diet. For instance, should be eat the flesh of any rodent having sharp prominent teeth, the child's teeth would grow just the same. Should be eat

In North-West Brazil both the parents and the baby take a bath together as soon as the five days' seclusion is at an end. This is accomplished with much strange cereinomal. I was fortunate enough to be present at ene of these baths, in the yeur 1904, among the Tuyúka on the Uaupé Lowards five in the morning, not locally before daybreak, the Indians carried nearly all the furniture and all the weapons into the open. A few days after birth the father, or rather in most tribes the grandfather, gives the child its name. The ceremony is celebrated among the tribes on the Upper Negro by a great carouse, to which all the relations are invited. The boys nearly all receive two names, usually connected with some animal, the girls only one. De Goeje relates that among the Tribs in Dutch Guayana the men have each two names, one for use in intercourse with strangers, and the other for the use of

The festival begins with a masked dance. All who take part in it wear masks of different animals, and mutate the voices and gait of these beasts to the accompaniment of deafeningly loud drums, trumpets and flutes. The idea is to propitiate the chief of all the Spirits of Evil and his demon followers. He is called Minuri. Women may not be present at this masked dance. The whole body of the youthful Oyana is then carefully worked over with this web, the patient usually fainting under the torture, and being laid unconscious in his hammock. He is bound in this with cords, and then a small fire is lighted underneath. In this hammock he lies one week or two, and may eat only mamor bread and a small kind of smoked fish He is even forbidden to drink water. CUSIOMS RELATING TO MARRIAGE

As a rule, the maiden emoys the greatest freedom until she marries. She disposes of her person as she pleases. Among many tribes, notably the Choroti and the Ashluslay on the Chaco, this leads to widespread "free-love" The women are the movers in this - Sometimes a woman will fight another with boxing gloves of tapir skin, or even wearing punchers made of bone, so as to obtain possession of a desired man. The maiden seeks out her own adorer at the dances, and later, in the same way, she seeks out for herself a life partner, and settles down presently into an industrious housewife and a good mother. It is otherwise among the Chane and Chinguano tribes, though they are so near at hand. Here the guls are very strictly kept at home by their mothers until they marry, and it is the man who makes all the overtures prior to marriage

Among the Karáya on the Yraguay the youths are taken away from their parents' lints, and go to live in huts specially built for the bachelors of the village. They live their until they marry. The whole community contributes very liberally to their support, and they lead an easy life fishing and limiting, and in all such ways preparing themselves for life generally.

On the whole, the guls do not long retain their freedom. Quite often children are betrothed to one another by their parents when still very small, and in that case the muden must follow her appointed husband so soon as both are old enough. Yet it is the custom with many tribes that the paients of the gnl shall put the chosen youth to all sorts of tests, in order to make sure that he is capable of managing a household and supporting a wife and family by his skill in hunting and fishing. Marriage is not often a religious ceremony, but is frequently the occasion of a dance or carouse. Henry Bates relates, however, of the Tecuna, on the Upper Amazon, that they celebrate every marriage, and also the coming of age of all the gnls, and other similar events of their family life, with solemn dances at which they have masques representing the chief one among their evil spirits with his following of demoniacal animals. When his parents have betrothed a young man in his infancy in British Guayana, he is in no way bound by their promise. On the contrary, it behoves him to seek a wife as soon as he is of marriageable age, and not of necessity the one to whom he was betrothed. When this is so, he asks to have all the grits made to her returned, such as pearls and other adormnents. Among the Mina—a very backward and degraded people, all the adorers of a maiden assemble and light it out with their fists who shall have her. The Arawak, in British Guayana, have this custom. If a young man destres a gul in marriage he goes to her father and begins a complaint, setting out what a poor fellow that man is who has no wife! To this the older man agrees with all sorts of graceful speeches. If, after these preliminaries, the desired maiden serves the young man with meat and drink, he knows he has her and her father's consent to his woong. He cats what she has set before him, and the marriage is concluded. In the same mainer the bridegroom signifies his acceptance of an offer made by a gul's parents when he eats of the dishes they place before him. If the maide is not yet old grouph to be married, her father gives the world-be bridgeroom either a widow or an older unmarried woman of the family to wife, and this latter becomes, later on servant to the real wife The Toba (a tube on the Gran Chaco) make the man submit to a much longer trial before he is taken into taxour by the guls parents For days he must dance in front of her house to the sound of a primitive kind of drain, which he beats with two sticks. If, presently, they myite him to come in and sit down at the hearth, he know be offer is accepted

Even now the custom of wife purchase prevails in many tribes. The young man obtains his wife simply by paying her parents so much down. It is so among the Toba mentioned above, and also among the herdsmen of the Goamo in the north of Colombia The gul's father sets a price, the suitor pays it usually a certain number of head of cattle maiden is the property of the man as soon as ever the price is paid. custom prevails in Guayana too.

I was fortunate enough to witness some very finely-planned dances of this kind in various tribes, and I was also able to get at the thought lying at the root of many of these masques in a way that no incretly passing inquirer could possibly do, since I lived so long and so intimately with the natives at that time. I learned the fashion of the dances celebrated by the Kobéua and Káua in particular. These tribes belong to the basin of the Upper Negro. All this mummery of grotesque faces and distorted grimaces appears at first sight almost like

RELIGION, MAGIC AND SORGERY

Wr. know but little about the religion of the South American Indian - It consists wholly in the personification of ideas, and culminates in some tribes in Demon-worship Tik interesting feature of this ancient cult is the fashion of holding dance festivals where all wear masks having a real significance They are to be witnessed all over or nearly all over South America, but hitherto no one has made a study of them to any great extent. In the last journey but one which I made in South America (1903-1905)

The lett hand photograph shows a dance at one of the large Death Festivals which ake place every ten of there out amongst he kobesus Indian. The dancers wear bast bands rund their recks with clubs under their aims and plats on wooden pages to which are attached wooden figures of the Orther rule is shown in the dance of the butterfits it demonstored the malar at the dance is the same as the one danced by the kaus Indians at Rio Mark.

our own carmval days, but in reality is not in the least a mere mad frolic, but represents a solemn funeral service

When an Indian dies, he is birried in the centre of the house in which he lived, inside a local to the accompanion of loud laments on the part of all his relatives. During the ensuing week, all the people of the village work with a will. The women prepare a drink of manoc, or of palm, or of maize, which is slightly alcoholic, and which ferments all the more quickly because they chew mouthfuls of the root as they put it in. The men prepare masks of thick white bast taken from a leafy tree, and paint them according to an agreed plan, with various tasteful patterns. A fringe, consisting of strips of yellow bast, adorus the legs of the dancers. Sleeves of a thicker kind of red bast cover the arms, and these are also ornamented with yellow fringe. When all is ready, the masked dance begins, and lasts from three in the afternoon until the following morning. The dances are performed by the men alone, but the women and children look on Each mask represents a Demon—To the imagination of the Indian the whole natural world is peopled with good and evil spirits, who exercise great influence over his life and death—He attributes no disease, above all no internal disease which he cannot understand, to natural causes. On the contrary, he puts illness, or death, or any kind of misfortune at all, down to either the vengeance of some enemy who is skilled in magic, or to evil spirits. His seeking after the bodily manifestation of the cause of every evil finds expression in his masked dances. In these he sees the spirits, acting and speaking together with their train of creatures of the water, earth, and air, or, again, these latter will be demons, often represented with wonderful art and mimicry.

The demon is in the mask, embodied in it, and also possesses the dancer for the time being who wears that particular mask.

When the funeral ceremony is over, the masks are carried in the early morning to the village green, set up on sticks, with the sleeves tightly field from one mask to the other, and set alight, then, to the loud wailing of all the company, the long row of figures burns from and to end. The demonsflee out of their temporary shelters and return to their usual dwelling-places, probably in some lofty hill or under some cataract.

They are myssible to ordinary mortals, but the medicine-man is able to see and to speak with them, owing to his supernatural powers

The spirits whom they seek to propitiate and hinder from further ill-will by these dances, are the spirits of animals, of more or less wicked spirits in human form (either of men or women), of giants or dwarfs

In proportion as these animals are harmless in reality, so powerful is the spirit of evil which possesses them. Thus the big azure butterfly Tataloko, is one of the most dangerous of demons. He has his dwelling in the highest of all the falls on the Uaupé, the fall furthest up that river of many falls. Here he brews all the malaria in a big bowl, and all who drink the water of the river fall ill. It is a fact that above this fall malaria is common, probably on account of the water, which is here white and almost stagmant, while the rest of the river basin is very healthy and free from fever

The Karayá on the Araguaya use dance-masks representing the spirit which they illustrate Women and children are allowed to witness the actual dance, but they are strictly forbidden to see the masks when unaccompanied, or when the wearer is putting on his mask in the forest. Here, too, the masques mostly represent the usual hunting or fishing expeditions. The masks are extraordinarily like the Duk-Duk masks of the Bismarck Archipelago. They are cylindrical erections of reeds, with delicate feather-work, which are worn upon the head, while the rest of the body down to the feet is hidden in a thick drapery of leaves. It is thus among the ribbs on the Xingu. Then, too, we find complete dancing-dresses made of planted palm-fibre, having leggings, sleeves and cap complete.

These masked dances are found also in the basin of the Upper Amazon and its northern tributaries, animals, and whom he can use either to help or to injure human beings. In cases of sickness the medicine-man allies himself with the demons, discusses the illness with them, and seeks their counsel in the case, getting from them an opinion as to the result of the attack. Through his sorteries he can command the evil spirit, who, once in an animal, now possesses the body of the sick man, to return whence it came, and thus to allow of the healing of the patient. The medicine-man plays a great part in the life of the South American Indian, and is often very greatly feared. He is the one who maintains intercourse between men and the spirit world. Through his supernatural powers he is able to communicate with demons and with the spirits of the dead, who often appear to him in the form of animals, and whom he can illness and death by menting an evil spirit to take possession of his body. In this mysterious force has the secret of his influence and power over his tribe. So as to maintain and strengthen the behief in his supernatural interconse with the spirit world, the medicine-man will practise his sorceries at hight, and in a solitary hut mintate most cleverly all possible voices of all imaginable beasts and so create the belief that he is in consultation with demons who come to him in the guise of wild beasts. He is usually a clever ventriloquist, and understands how to produce two voices of differing tone in the most convincing way, and these are heard conversing, now near, now as from a distance, in such a manner as to be unmitchigible to all but himself.

The dancers are adorned with high feather diadems, and give forth music from large Pan flutes and drums

The making of a medicine-man begins in carbest youth, and continues often for years. The candidate must prove that he is strong enough to maintain an infimate intercourse with the spirit world. This he does by hying alone in a solitary place, by fasting for a year at a stretch, by silence and abstinence, by taking strong emetics, by drinking tobacco-water, by real or by feigned combats with wild beasts, and especially with the jaguar. At the same time the would be medicine-man is initiated by an older brother of the fraterinty into all the secrets of his craft. The medicine-man is able to change himself into any animal indeed, in many tribes the belief is prevalent that he can turn himself at any time into a jaguar, and that when he dies his soul does not go to the abiding-place of souls like other men, but wanders for ever in the form of a very fierce jaguar in the forests, and is very dangerous to human beings. It is, therefore, not strange that among several of the

tubal languages of South America we find the same word for juguar as for medicine-man

He works his cines in all probability by means of hypnotic suggestion and magnetism, especially by the former He will smoke furiously, take quantities of shuff and sundry intoxicating drugs, will dance and sing and make monotonous music for hours at a time on his magic instruments, chief of which is the gound rattle, until he is worked into a kind of eestasy, in which he has all kinds of hallicinations 1148 is followed by a condition of complete intoxication, in which he sees all sorts of similar illusory pictures. he awakes.—And whatever he says he has seen in this trance the Indian takes for a revelation.—The accompanying commonal which the medicine man carries out as part of the treatment in order to work upon the imagination of the patient and his relatives is very similar in every tribe, no matter where abouts in South America it be. He will swing the magic tattle and maintain a monotonous song often for hours at a stretch. He will interrupt this only to give the patient volumes of tobacco-snoke in the face or over the affected part and at the same time squeeze and spit upon the latter.

All this noise, the smoking, and the continually repeated exactly similar movements of the medicine-main must have an effect upon the patient that can only be described as hypnotism. Finally he sucks the painful part and after some time produces from his month bones, pieces of guit, thoris, missel shells, bits of wood often even beetles, caterpillars,

CUSIONS RELATING TO

I suppose there is not one tribe in South America where one would not find that they had some sort of theory as to the nature of the essence that dwell- within our bodies and energizes and completes our being. That there is this general behelf in this essential spiritual. Something call, it Soul, Spirit Breath, Shade or what you will, and in its con-

thined existence after death, is not only certain from the information obtained from the tribes with whom we are in contact, but exidence of it can also be clearly found in a number of enstons which prevail among them, which have undoubtedly arisen out of this belief in the existence of an immortal soul in man

As we have seen, the masked dance and the medicine-man owe their existence to the behef in a world of spiritual beings. This behef is vet more plainly to be read in the ecremonies that accompany death and the burial of the dead. Since illness is nearly always attributed to the

When the illness is an infections one, and when the tribesmen see with horior the infection spread rapidly from one to another as the wicked spirit seizes upon fresh victims, the diead that the demon of the particular sickness will presently make his home within each one grows greatly in individual members of the tribe. In a few isolated instances we find even to day that when a mother dies, her baby is sent to join her and they are buried together. This custom also has its origin in the strong sense that in the other life men cling fondly still to what they loved here in the world they have been forced to leave. Occasionally, on the death of a relative, they seek out a "scapegoat" on whom all known and unknown guilt is cast. This is usually an old woman, and she is made, as it were, a sm-offering to the dreaded spirit. We find on the occasion of a death all sorts of self-imposed penances, fastings, wounds, mutilations, and so on, undertaken as signs of mounning. These all have then origin in the same thing—fear of the anger of the dead. They would fain safeguard themselves from this by chastising and punishing then own bodies in every possible way, until they are reduced to a most miserable condition. This self-injury is usually confined to the widower of the widow of the departed, but now and again it is undergone by the nearest relatives also. The most harmless kind of initilation is the cutting off of the han, and this is general in all the South American tribes. This is especially menumbent upon all widows, and no widow is allowed to remark until her han has grown quite long again. Until then she may not put on any finery, and takes part in none of the festivals. Some tribes in La Plata used to time critelly on the occasion of a death. They used to cut olf a fmger-joint each fime such an event occurred. Behexing as he does that in the other world the present life is continued, the ludian natmally thinks the dead are exposed to all the vicissitudes of earth, and so it is the duty of the survivors to protect the body from cold or rain or rough weather. That is probably why in so many tribes it is the fashion to biny the dead within his own but, or at least to creet a sheltering root above his grave, and to keep a fine burning beside it for some time alto Then again, the Indians adopt all kinds of measures in order foreibly to limiter the return of the dead - bear of the ghost of a dead man extends to his dead body, and to all things touching it, nay, even to the people who have come in contact with it. Hence all those who took part in the funeral ceremony are held to be unclean, sometimes for unite a long time, and are required to cleanse themselves by means of the bath of all that could in any way continue to remind them of the spirit of the dead.

Among many tribes, the cleansing and purifying of the hiit or even of the village is not enough, but the hiit, the village, or even the district is deserted in a wild panic because of the fear of the vengeful spirit of the dead. Occasionally the hiit where the death took place is burnt down

They often seek to drive away the spirit of the dead through threats, shrieks, the noise of all kinds of musical instruments, unisket-shots, etc., both at the burial and for many days after. For this purpose they use a special instrument in many tribes, called in English a "bull-roarer". We have it in

Most South American Indians do not depend on hunting for food though they requestly practise it in order to obtain a change in their rather monotonous menu. It consists of a slender, rather long and flat piece of wood, which, when it is swing round on a string, makes a most smister buzzing sound. The Boroió in the interior of Brazil use it in all their funcial ecremonies. Women may not behold the bull-roarer—they would die were they to catch sight of one.

The most effective means of restraining the dead from molesting the living is, of course to render it impossible for the corpse to move about for the spirit is, however unwillingly, identified with it, and cannot leave the grave without it. So the body is mutilated, or fast bound in a variety of ways, or pressed tightly into a basket or a trough, or the earth above the grave is pressed and stamped down very finily, and weighted with blocks of wood or stone, or other things.

Some tribes carry this lear of the dead to such an extent that they even avoid mentioning his name, and endeavoir to blot out his memory completely. Among the Goapros in Colombia the name of the dead is never uttered in the presence of his family. If it be, the guilty one who has done so is at once put to death, or else is obliged to pay a heavy fine, often two or more oxen. If he refuse to pay, his cattle are taken by force, and as a result there is a fend between his claim and that of the dead main. On the Gran Chaco we find some tribes with whom it is the custom when one dies for all the others to at once after their mames, so that the ghost may be unable to find the one he may come to seek.

lament over him both at the time of death and long after. All the time they are thus showing their affection for the dead man and clearing themselves of an share in his undoing, they are openly trying to appease his anger or in any case to direct it into some other quarter.

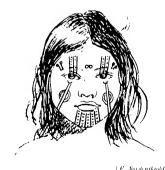

From all this it is clearly seen that the Indian has no understanding of the difference between body and soil. The identifies body and soil completely always. This leads, as we have seen, to distinct rules as to diet both before and after the birth of children. The Indian believes that the eating of a certain kind of meat communicates the qualities of the animals to those who eat it, or to their children. The same notion induces many of the tribes to imingle the ashes of the bones of their ancestors in their drink, and thus assimilate their good qualities in a very practical way. The Kobéna, on the Upper Uaipe who cherish this, to our way of thinking, barbarious custom, celebrate a solemn dance at the same time. Those who take part in it wear long, drooping streamers of yellow bast round the neck, and carry under the left arm a club adorned with yellow flags made of bast, meantime they draw deep notes from wooden pipes, to which are fastened carved wooden figures, representing various kinds of tish

MISCLEE ANTOUS CUSTOMS

WE know very little of the social relationships of the South American Indians, especially of the tribes inhabiting the tropical forest region

The social customs of the Boroto, who are a hunting tribe, are most strange. Instead of living in families or in clans, we find the men all living together in community. The pivot of the Bororo society is the men's house, which stands in the middle of the village. The family lints are really mere shelters for the women and children. All the backelors live together in the community house until they are.

Here the big hunting partie, are arranged and from here the humi starts to the song of the men. Here the lament for the dead is made. The gut- are dragged with violence to the menhut and become the property of several men at once

All the men of the tube together constitute a sort of chib for the purpose of carrying on the necessary hunting for the tribe. The older men alone, respected holders of various digniticand offices are what can be called married men. They take their part in the hunt ing expeditions, or have to work in the community house in the club to keep all things there in order, they lead the singing, that 'day

These are sent in by the women Family life is a privilege clearly to be attained only by the older and more powerful of the tribe the tropical forest regions, we find the social unit in the village community, while in the north, where the villages consist of one house only, it is limited to one family or claim. Each village community constitutes a complete independent whole - a social state in miniature - The sense of race is but weak throughout these tribes, and the different villages are not intimately connected with one another in It is true that many of the tribes have a chief, but his authority over the whole race is, in any case, at the present day merely a nonimal one, and appears chiefly in his presidency over the tribal festivals. In each village community, the eldest man is regarded as the chief. His is largely a representative position. He receives all strangers and entertains them, and especially all white men who come to the place, on behalf of the community, by whose wishes he is bound. He presides over all assemblies and consultations within the village boundary, and he has the right to summon them. In all events which concern the village as a whole such as limiting expeditions tishing parties and fends with other tribes, he has the right to call his people together, and assign to each individual lus appointed place. Disputes among the village folk are very rare, but in the event of one arising he can only interfere with warning words the is not allowed to punish other In especial, he Darty dare not interfere in a blood feud That must be left over to the injured family. He takes a leading place in time of war, and yet the others only obey him just so far as Among a great they like many tribes the cultivated ground is the property of the community as a whole, and is divided and tilled by all under the direction of the chief result of the tulage and of the chase is divided among the different families. The personal qualities needed in a chief to-day, and those to which he owes his office, are not so much skill in warfare as the possession of the necessary tact, skill, experience, and knowledge, to enable him to hold intercourse with other tribes, and, above all, with the white man. Thus prisoners taken in war who have been received into a tribe can attain to this office if they show marked fitness in these respects. As a rule, however, the office of clinef is hereditary , usually it passes from father to son, but occasionally also by the roundabout way of the father's brothers for it always follows according to age, so that a son is often a fairly old man before he succeeds to his father's position

North of the Amazon many tribes use great kettle-drinns of wood to call together the different tribes for consultations or for festivals. These are beaten in a variety of different ways, and act as telephones to spread all news. They are mighty cylinders of wood, usually carried hanging free They are beaten with drumsticks of some hard kind of wood, generally with heads made of india-rubber. The sound carries far, as I was able to prove to my own satisfaction. On the Yapurá and Içá, these drums serve chiefly to call to arms in time of war, but they are also used when there is to be a festival, to get the people together. The tribes living along those two rivers have invented a curious drumlanguage, which is now used by the traders in rubber for purposes of industry. The Indians tell each other all sorts of news, and even hold whole conversations by means of these drums, according to the way they are beaten. slowly or fast, with deep notes or with light strokes.

The great lends of the past we find no more to day. The old wars between individual tribes, or groups of tribes, have in most instances been exchanged for peaceful sports, which are held on the occasion of mutual visits at the commencement of their great carousals. These sports often lead to bloodshed, but are always carried out according to a regular set rule, and never lead to real hostilities, but must satisfy the most rigid laws of hospitality.

In conclusion, the Inchans of South America are rapidly dying out as a result of the advance of European settlers. Sometimes willingly sometimes against their will, they are entering the service of the white man, and are living amongst the whites. The old men are dying off, the young ones have new interests, they are i-hamied of the amenit customs and ways, they are forgetting the legends their Lathers knew. Tribal organizations are falling to pieces. Thousands die every year from the unhealthy conditions under which they work in the rubber-fields, and of various epidermes, introduced among them by the white men. Thousands and tens of thousands die owing to the inhuman crincity of the so called representatives of European cultine and civilization. It cannot but full every heart with sorrow that is able to recognize that here we have a sympathetic and easily civilized race in process of externimation owing to the greed of a few. There is no future for the American native races. They will yanish away and disappear before our very exes.

CHAPTER XLIII

TRANCE = Bg / CLIVE / HOLLAND

Althorean it is of course true that in many portions of final France, more especially in Temote districts, there are still smyrying customs which date from time immemorial, modern progress has in France as elsewhere, tended to their abandonment. In the space at our disposal it would be obviously impossible to deal with many which, interesting in themselves might yet perhaps be held to be more of local than inniversal interest. We have, therefore, been compelled to select a few for treatment which may in a sense be esteemed typical of many others.

On the morning of the Pardon the pilrims come in procession with their hands with their hards and with their hards.

The seem depicted is at one of the most important Pardon, near Quinner.

There are comparatively few customs surviving in France at the present day which differ materially from those of other European comities. Among the upper and middle classes the birth of a child, especially if he or she be the heir or heness to fortune, or a noble name, is marked by a somewhat more ecremonious amonneement than with us. Relatives are more universally notified of the happy event, and the gathering connected with the ceremony of baptism, which of course takes, place, as a general rule, with Catholics within a short time of the miant's birth, is of a more claborate character. The practice of placing salt upon the tongue of the miant is of course common to all Catholic countries, and is, therefore, not especially a custom of France.

Whilst travelling in Brittany we had pointed out to us a certain sacred well a little off the wayside, near which we were told in the fourteenth or fifteenth century alioly hermit had his cell,

This is one of the most picturesque Pardons of Brittany, to which numbers of the piktinis come by ea. The sight of it is never likely to fade from the memory of those who have writered it and as the little fleet of red brown sailing and rowing boats approaches the land with banners waving and the chanting of bymes the scene is wonderfully beautiful and in the waters of which spring it is the custom of some of the mothers of neighbouring villages even nowadays to dip their babies soon after birth, as a preventive of infantile complaints, and as a means of securing for them the protection of the saint and good fortime

When we come to customs relating to marriage, we find in various parts of France many which are interesting and unique, some of them surviving from ancient times and retaining much of the picture-squeness and interest of old-time observances. It is true that the difference in most cases between French and English marriage customs arises from the fact that the French, as a general rule, know little of each other before they are affianced, often, indeed, nothing at all the marriage having been arranged for them by their respective parents or other people.

In towns especially there is generally a civil as well as religious marriage ceremony, and, as a general rule, marriages among the upper and upper middle classes are marked by formalities which are very much more elaborate than those usually prevailing in England

It is especially in the provincial districts of France that one comes across interesting, picturesque, and often elaborate ceremonies connected with marriage. In Brittany, for example, the wedding of a small farmer's daughter or that of a prosperous village tradesman is often made an occasion for the expenditure of a very considerable amount of money. Far more, indeed, than one would anticipate the families of the contracting parties could afford. Not only are almost mnumerable guests myrted or myrte themselves to the wedding feast, but the junketing is continued for several days in the case of a marriage of the prosperous or well-to-do. One old-time custom in connection with Breton marriages is that of the bridegroom scattering largesse among the crowd of beggar women and children, who habitually congregate around the church doors on such occasions.

France 1017

The wedding feast is very frequently spread beneath the trees in the main street of the village, beneath those of the Grande Place, or m some convenient held not too far away from a wineshop or the church often the guests amuse them selves whilst the final preparations of the feast are being made by dancing in the square or along the streets. The bride and bride groom lead the dance, the best man and bride's-maids and then attendant swars following in close proximity, and the guests joining in as the fancy takes them. The dance is a form of gavotte, and the misic is generally supplied by a couple of peasants playing the buniou and a violin, and sometimes a kind of bagpipes, even occasionally a concertina or accordion. The wedding feast, with its huge tankards of cider, plates of meat, and large slices of bread, is prolonged far into the afternoon, and then the bride and bridegroom, bride's-maids and gnests begin to dance again, keeping up the festivities far into the might, and often, indeed, continuing them the next day.

At Ailes, in Provence, noted for its beautiful girls and women, takes place animally one of the most charming customs in France the Fete de la Jeunesse. It is the custom in the neighbourhood for the chato, or young guls, not to wear the coil until about their eighteenth year then, if they conform to the ancient custom, they wear the calotto of black silk fete partakes somewhat of the nature of a combination of Olympian games and of the Welsh Eisteddfod, and to it the chate, or young girls, come from far and near with their francés mounted on the same horse, the men riding in front and the girls on a kind of pillion behind them. The men are dressed, some of them in white, wearing

Although there are many other interesting facts connected with gullhood in other parts of France, they do not differ so greatly from those of other Continental lands to warrant detailed description. The customs having relation to the First Communion, are very picturesque and interesting. Every traveller in provincial France has probably, on more than one occasion, seen bands of neatly-dressed boys, generally attitud in black suits with broad bands of white saturable with gold-fringed ends round then arms, or crowds of little girls from ten years upwards to seventeen or eighteen, dressed almost like miniature brides, then Prayer-books in then hands, hurrying to then First Communion in the village or town church. This is a great event in the life of a French girl or boy, especially in that of the former, for on the occasion she becomes an object of interest to all her family, and after the solemin service in the church, it is the custom for her to visit the houses of her relatives and friends accompanied by her mother and father, and also by admiring relatives and friends.

Funeral customs of the French do not differ very materially, it is true, from those of England or of other Western nations, but there is always great elaboration over the arrangements of the funeral itself in the case of the upper and upper middle classes. For example, the body of the deceased person lies in state in private houses, and is viewed by relatives and friends much more frequently than with us. The room in which the body lies is turned into a chapelle ardente, with blazing candles and watchers, and on the day of the finite all the house front is sometimes bung with black and silver hangings, and the mutes with nodding plumes, uniform and staffs, almost like those of beadles, walking in front of the procession, are very commonly seen in France to day. The custom of placing linge wieaths, crosses and other emblems made of galvanized wire, painted manye and black or white, with flowers made of painted fin, locads, or wax, is much more common than with us, and in many cemeteries in France one finds the moniments erected over the graves lining thickly with such emblems, and we ourselves have seen piles of them in the cemeteries of provincial France many feet in height.

Another custom is to have let in the monument or tombstone a little glazed recess in which is placed a photograph of the deceased person who has buried beneath. In some cases these are not merely ordinary photographs, but beautiful miniatures executed in colour on ivory or wood. Many English people, when visiting cemeteries in France, and perhaps more especially those in rural districts, have been surprised, and even shocked, to find bones and skulls scattered about the graveyard, and have wondered how it is that such a thing is permitted. The explanation of it is generally to be found in the fact that in many instances only leases are taken of the graves by relatives, and at the end of the lease the bodies occupying them are disinterred, and the coffins and bones are piled up in a corner of the graveyard, and the burying plot is re-let to someone else

It is difficult for us, for whom the opening of a grave even when a legal order for exhimation has been obtained is distasteful, to regard without distress, and even feelings of disgust, such disturbing of the dead. In France it is quite otherwise, and we have heard, though we cannot vouch for the entire accuracy of the statement, that leases for graves are granted for as short a term as three years. Probably, however, the average length of time would be nearer ten. In many chinches of rural France, more especially those of Brittany, one finds an enclosed or partially enclosed building in the chirchyard, often against the church wall itself, into which the bones of the dead, when disinterred, are thrown, or in some cases systematically collected together, the skulls being in one corner, the large bones in another, and the smaller bones in yet another

The provincial funeral in France even of a peasant is a ninch more picturesque as well as a much more interesting ceremony than with its. Some farm or other cart is transformed into a hearse for the occasion, and the village priest with his choir boys and acolytes come to the house of the deceased, when a procession is formed to the place of interment, a cross or banner borne in front, the Curé in his white surplice walking close behind with the chon boys and acolytes in surplices, while on foot behind the improvised hearse, over which a spotless sheet or pall has been thrown, come the relatives and mourners, tridging along the highway in their picturesque peasant costumes.

It is chiefly in the villages and smaller provincial towns that one finds quaint and curious customs and smyrvals of bygone ages. In Normandy and Brittany it is a very common practice to find the village inn indicated by a brinch of herbs hung outside on the street wall, or over the entrance, and on Palm Sunday, in Paris, the larger towns, and even in some of the smaller villages hawkers are found outside the chinch doors with brinches of palm for sale

Duelling may still be said to be one of the customs of France, although, it is true, of late years duels have become much less frequent, and have assumed almost a farcical nature. Only a few years ago an insult, dispose, or point of honour was almost sure to be settled by a "meeting" between the disputants. Now, although a number of duels are animally fought on French soil, a large percentage of these by army officers or public men and journalists, very few result in serious inpury to the combatants, and a mere scratch where swords are the weapons, and in the case of pistols a couple of ineffective shots, seem generally to be held to satisfy the honour of the duellists. In the wine districts of France there still continues in many places the practice of each wine-grower in the village or neighbourhood round about contributing a few litres of wine to the Curé of the church which he attends, or to which he is nominally attached. The custom, it is true, is not so imiversal as formerly, owing possibly to the less esteem in which the Church is held in France to-day. Occasionally, even in former times, the practice of giving this wine in the way we have described was felt to be a tax which some of the peasantry sought to avoid

In few portions of France have customs and ceremonies of ancient origin a firmer hold upon the inhabitants at large than in Brittany. Here doing the Western coast, one finds not a few picturesque customs in connection with the fishing industry upon which so considerable a proportion of its coastwise inhabitants depend. Near L'Orient on the morning of St. John's day the sardine fishery is blessed. The dergy, preceded by a crueitix and baimers, walk in procession from the Chapel of Notice Dame de l'Armor, One Lady of the Sea, to the beach and embark in boats. They then proceed for a infe or two out to sea, where they are met by liundreds of boats from L'Orient and other places on the coast. When these are formed into a circle, with the boats containing the priests in the centre, the Benediction is pronounced. If the weather be favourable lond strains of repording are heard from the throats of the lusty tisherimer, and the latter are soon speeding their way over the waters encouraged by the blessing to beheve that success will be theirs. Yet another custom which, so far as we know, is confined to Brittany, and perhaps to only the one ruined chapel where we discovered it prevailing, is for girls who desire to know whether they will be married within a certain period to cut off a wisp of their hair and place it in a hollow in one of the walls, not far from the altar. If it is blown away within a certain time—which we should generally imagine

it was they will be married within a year, but if the han remains in the niche their their prospects of a speedy marriage are remote

Many ancient customs survive in Brittany in connection with the Pardons which form such interesting festivals. Almost every church in Lower Brittany is supposed to be under the protection of a patron saint, who, unlike the dead saints of churches generally, continues, according to the belief of the common people and the teaching of the puests, to work intracles in the interests of the faithful and has the power of procuring absolution for sumers.

The popularity of these Pardons varies considerably according to the reputed sanctity of the saint and the power with which he is supposed to be endowed. Some are famed for their ability to protect men, others women, and others children, while one, St. Cornely, is believed to take

Every year a prize for virtue is awarded to one of the pirk of this village, which is about ten mile, distant from Paris. The origin of the custom is lost in antiquity, but the exemptions to day are elaborate and attact great crowds.

cattle under his special care and his Pardon is celebrated in conjunction with that of St. Nicodemus at the little church not far from St. Nicholas in the Morbihan district. The Pardon takes place on the first Saturday in August in each year, and in the meadows round about the church are gathered every kind of farm animal brought by the various owners to be blessed by the saints, which process of blessing is accompanied by the touching of the animals by the priests with the various relies of the saints. When they have been so touched their owners drive them homeward, feeling quite sure that at least for one year the animals will be productive and free from the adments which owners of cattle so much dread. (See illustration on page 1616.)

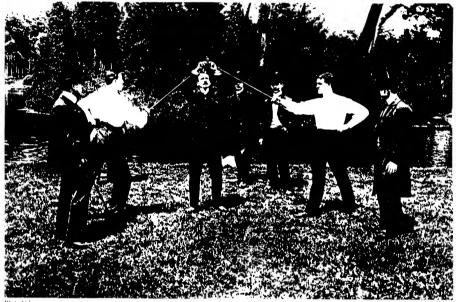

Great Pardons usually last three or more days. On the might previous to their commencement the church bells are tolled, the interior of the building is decorated with flowers, and in some cases is adorned with fairy-lamps and the effigies of the various saints are clothed in Breton costumes. At many Pardons one still finds gals carrying slender willow sticks fastened by gay tibbons to their wrists, and on the bark of the sticks are sometimes carved curious devices. These are considered in the nature of gages d'amoin, and the girl accepting such a silt frem a vouth courting her is regarded as willing to marry him. Among the strange customs which distinguish the Breton peasants there is none more remarkable than that of wearing the hair long. Even nowadays many men cultivate long tresses hanging down well below then shoulders. It is a custom of very ancient origin mentioned by Lucian, who, of the Armoricans, wrote, "Quondam per colla decora crimibus effusis." The women do not show a single lock, and the girl who might be tempted by the beauty of her tresses to allow a ringlet to escape beneath her closely fitting cap or cort would not

It is doubtless this custom which has reconciled the Bieton guls and women to the almost universal practice of selling then han, which is disposed of to merchants who attend the Pardons and village fêtes each year for the purpose of buying the hair

In Brittany and some other parts of I rance there is a curious custom relating to the mode of wearing the black flap hats of which the men are so proud. These are turned up at the side in a point. Young immarried men wear them so that the latter comes over the ear, while married men wear the point behind, and widowers in front. It is thus perfectly easy for anyone knowing the custom to at once guess the state of the wearer.

Another Breton custom, which may possibly be found elsewhere in France, is that of placing offerings of the hair of sick cattle and horses on the altar of churches dedicated to saints who are supposed to have animals in their special care. At the chapel of St. Herbot, near Huelgoat, the altar is often covered with the hair of horses and cows, placed there by their owners so that the saint's good offices may be secured to aid the recovery of the sick beasts.

Bees have always been held in high esteem in France. They are said to have been embroidered as emblens upon the robes of the great Charlemagne himself. In certain districts in France the bees are considered as "members of the family" and are encouraged rather than otherwise to enter the houses, and when there is a wedding the hives are gaily decorated with scarlet cloth, flaunch or other material, and when a death occurs in the family the hives are disped in black

At many places in Brittany and in the Atlantic departments the wedding ecremony is

At Coatdry there is a stream noted for the curious double crystals found in its bed. These are shaped like an ordinary cross of like. St. Anchew's cross. They are highly prized as charms against hydrophobia, rheimatism, neuralgia, headache, and other ailments, and are worn by the peasantry in small bags round their niecks. The story goes that a pagar chief found a cross erected near Coatdry in ancient times, and cast it into the stream. As a mark of Heavenly displeasure the crystals forthwith in the bed of the stream took the form of crosses, and thus provided all who would with the sacred emblem in place of the one the pagan chief had destroyed.

By tradition, temperament and custom the Spaniard is a gentleman. Borrow, who gained an intimate knowledge of them, declared that, in their social intercourse no people in the world exhibit a juster feeling of what is due to the dignity of human nature than the spaniard. In his collective capacity, he is inistructful, strong-headed, and apt to prove mirchable. Yet, individually, he is remarkable for the excellence of his personal and moral qualities. He is quick to take offence, but never, through ignorance or factlessness, proffers one. He is slow to bestow his confidence, but he never, without cause, withdraws it. The Spanish character still retains "the grace of a day that is dead," and while grace is not necessarily a virtue, it is a flower often found on the path that leads to it. It arises from the fact that the Spaniard never forgets his personal worth and self-respect, even if he may be inclined to exaggerate it.

Speaking for the Pennisula at large, the only general custom for the people is, we may well say, to dance and sing, to encourage mendicants, argue on politics, and spoil the children, relieved by the observance of carmyal, "the periodical explosion of freedom and folly," for carmyal means music and dancing banter and love making, masks, beggars and bull fights

Corpus Christi Day is observed throughout Spain, and Ascension Day is commemorated in all the Spainsh Cathedrals and churches. The 1st and 2nd of November are the days on which all Spainards pay their animal visit to the cemeteries—those forbidding enclosures within high walls, honeycombed with inches in which the coffins are deposited and walled up—and attach floral emblems and inneral wreaths to the outer slabs of the serviced sepulchies.

A RELIGIOUS DANCE, SEVILLE

One of the curious customs of the Hols Week in Seville is a dance by hoss before the High Aliai. the chiqueroshall be formally opened. For this purpose two algorities gailed a la antigua, in black velvet with cloaks of the same material and plunned hats, enter, on praining horses, the archway under the president's box. They separate, canter round either semicincle of the arena to meet at the opposite side and galloping back together, salute the president and disappear under the arch way. For a minute the archa is empty, then the alguardes reappear in the opposite entrance and, to the quick march of the orchestra, the imposing procession of the lighters begins. At the head are the mounted alguardes, closely followed by the three maladeres, marching abreast according to rigid efficient the order of semiority with the oldest on the left. The right arms are free but the left hands hold, upon the hip, the end of the glittering capotes de pasco, or parade cloaks, which depend from the left shoulder and are passed round the waist from left to right. Next come the banderilleras, a numble band in bright silk and velver, then the mounted picadores. These are followed by the red-shirted ring-attendants, who plug the wounds of the horses with balls of tow, thrash them to their feet if they are able to stand, and receive another charge from the bull, and harness their dead carcases to the team of juigling mules which bring up the rear

The stride with which they swing against the beat of the music across the arena is a dignified and exhibitating spectacle, and a little wave of admiration and pleasure rustles through the spectators. The fighters halt before the president's box and gravely salute him by raising then monteras. The president returns the compliment with his top-hat and the procession disperses. The mule teams disappear, together with all the picadores, save two, who wait a few yards apart against the barrier, about a score of yards from the toril from which the bull will appear. The espadas and banderilleras cutrust their parade-cloaks to the keeping of friends in the audience, take instead the sun-faded, blood-stained red and yellow capas, and settle their feet more comfortably into their running-shoes. A trumpet call summons one of the alguacites, who catches in his plumed hat the key that the president throws down, passes it on to an ancient attendant, and makes for safety. The old functionary turns the key in the lock of the toril and stands aside.

Annd a hush that can be felt the beast emerges into the arena at a gallop, scents the waiting fineadores, and makes a feint at each of them in passing. The prick that one of the fineadores had administered to him as he passes, reminds him of their existence. He paws the ground, snorts anguly, and charges at one of the horsemen with lowered head.

Each of the six bulls engaged will kill two or more horses before the banderilleras are summoned to play the bull and plant half a dozen barbed darts in his muscular withers. Thus decorated, toro faces the espada, who lures him into making a series of characteristic rushes. Then raising the hilt of his sword to the level of his eye, he takes careful aim down the blade. The bull springs forward, the sword, peinted to the vidiciable spot at the base of the brain, disappears up to the hilt, and the man swings clear as the bull staggers and crashes to the earth. The carease is harnessed up to the jungling mule team and dragged out at the gallop, fresh sand is raked over the dark patches and the trimiper announces that the scene is set for a repetition of the drama.

The humanitarian who thinks that the dons will be induced to forgo bull-lighting from motives of humanity is doomed to perpetual disappointment. Bull lighting is in the air, in the soil, in the blood -it is more than a national institution, at is an inherited cultiusiasm, and will remain the ruling passion and the all-dominating custom of the peoples of the Peninsula.

CHAPTER XLV ITALY, By LUIGI RICCI

THE Italian pennisula having been occupied by minicrous and independent States since the fall of the Roman Empire, and only lately joined together politically into one kingdom, the customs of its peoples are still as different as they are varied. It being impossible to describe them with any order or arrangement, I shall mention only the most peculiar customs. It must, however, be observed that in the largest towns, especially of Lombardy and Piedmont, the upper classes have adopted more or less the universal habits of Western Europe

In Southern Italy bands of peasants come down from the Apennines to visit the villages nine days before Christmas. They play on the barpipes and sing before the 'Presepto,' a rule representation of the Bethlehem stable.

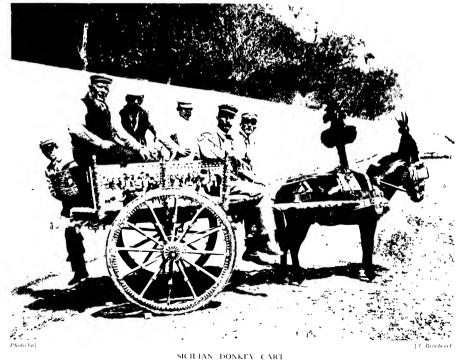

A population, eighty per cent of which can neither read nor write, cannot help being superstitious, and thus in Italy no marriage is arranged without consulting the confessor, who is also the constant visitor and adviser in all family matters. Churches and shrines, in towns and the country, are innumerable, and though convents and monasteries have by law been suppressed, monks and nins are still found everywhere. The beheff in minaculous images is universal, and it would fare ill with anyone who should dare to express the least doubt about them. Mnacles recur every year with clockwork regularity in nearly every town or village, and they are witnessed by worshippers as numerous as they are credulous. At Naples, St. Januarius' congealed blood liqueties on the date of his festival, a miracle which over one hundred thousand people see, and which, if delayed in its performance, will excite the anger of the screaming mob, threatening the priests and the saint himself with their wrath. St. Nicolas at Bari has got a miracilous knee, from which flows continually a rill of water which, bottled up in small phials, is sold throughout the provinces at a very high price as a sure remedy for all ills, even for broken legs. A Madonna der Miracoh was discovered by a little girl in a wood - it was only a clumsy picture - around which a chapel was brill, and to which eighty thousand pilgrims from a cricle of one hundred unles flock every summer, bringing with them their suis and the money they have been able to save during the year. They throw the Latter at the foot of the altar, where the priests literally collect it with takes, measuring it by the bushel, and promising salvation to as many souls as there are prastics (four shillings) in the collection. In several more enlightened places these festivals have more the fun and frohe of real piemes than the camestness of religious services.—Nine days before Christmas, in Southern Italy, the Pifferani, or pipers, come down from the Apennines, and visit all the best houses in the provincial towns and in the villages, where they play on their bugpipes and sing before the "Presepio," a rinde representation of the Bethlehem stable. They return to their straw huts, which are their homes, with the presents of the grateful families whose houses their song has cheered. (See illustration on page 1038)

The goat-herds do nothing else but watch their herds among the solitary slopes of the mountains. At night they sleep in straw huts on beds consisting of loose straw covered with goat-skins. Their only amusements are playing on the whistle ("cruffello") and staring at the landscape.

The "Contraterinte" are religious associations of the more cager worshippers, who clothed from head to foot with hooded dominoes (see illustration on page 1046), perform the charitable duty of attending funerals, and, as in Florence, the "Miscricordia" attend also to street accidents. These "Contraterinte," together with the clergy, go also in procession on the celebration of some saint's feast, whose wooden statue, diessed as life-like as possible, is carried round the town. On these occasions every household adones its windows and balconics with the display of the best

The traveller in Italy should not gauge the goodness or the safety of a neighbourhood by the number of crosses creeted along its wayside. They are creeted wherever a number has been committed and are a silent warning of the lawlessness of its inhabitants.

Whenever a storm rages, the bells of all the churches in its area are set ringing to drive away the devils that bring on earth the thinder and the lightning.

On the Testival of St Anthony all domestic and farm animals are blessed by the visiting parson, who thus insures them against illness or accidents during the following year. On that same occasion the helds and the harvests are blessed and insured against harl and locusts

The popularity of a saint can be valued by the number of its images and of the votive offerings hanging round them. These are of all imaginable kinds, but generally

Gambling is universal in Italy, and is the largest source of the Government revenues. Lottenes are drawn every week in all the principal towns, so that the Italians, who for many centuries have been addicted to the "dolce far mente," find in gambling the readiest way of becoming poorer and poorer. The book most universally read in Italy is the "Book of Dreams," a kind of alphabetical list of words, each one of them bearing a number selected at random from one to ninety. Any event, real or magmany, affords thus a certain number of numerals to gamble with, and as the Government takes good care to exact that the prizes offered should never exceed a third of the amounts resulting from the laws of probability, it always contrives to secure an enormous, though voluntary revenue.

Marriages are arranged by the parents, the bride and bridegroom not meeting (at least openly) till everything has been arranged by the parents and the so-called "ambassador," who is generally a near relation representing the bridegroom, and whose chief duty is that of securing the largest amount of dowry, proportionate to the income of his chent. In Calabria and in Sicily a brother, or other male relation, of a gull would feel in duty bound to thrash or shoot a young man who dared to speak to her

In the southern provinces the custom still prevails, when a visitor stays overnight, of the menhaving then meals apart from the women of the household, who are not otherwise visible.

The honcymoon of the middle-class is passed in complete seclusion for a period varying from played by calling out in a lond voice a number, at the same time showing as many of his fingers as he supposes will be the sum of the number of fingers shown by his opponent and himself. With the continuous druking and shouting the players get so excited that they generally end by quarrelling about the game and coming, not to blows, but to the use of the kinfe, often with fatal results. As soon as a murder is committed, the culpin absords to the nearest wood, his friends doing their best to keep him supplied with food, whilst the friends of the numdered man do their utmost to revence themselves by Lilling the aggressor or his nearest relatives. On the Saturday before Easter there is a peculiar and popular custom in Florence (see illustration on page 1042) by a wire with the High Altai THE FEAST OF ST ROSALIA, PALERMO

The annual procession of the statue of St. Rosalia the patroness of Pakerno in Sicily, is the occasion of several days' rejoicings. The statue is drawn through the streets upon an enormous charrot

A large chariot in the Square before the Cathedral is connected A priest sets fire to a rocket field to a wooden dove, which flies from the altar to the chariot along the wire and sets alight its fireworks. An immense crowd, mostly of countrymen, in the Square cheers the performance whenever the meworks blaze out at once, this being for them a sure sign that the forthcoming harvest will be plentiful. Should the dove miss setting the tireworks alight at once, the crowd leaves the Square disappointed and dejected, in the belief that the year's harvest will be a very poor one

The rude belief in witches is almost universal in Italy A girl, disappointed at being jilted. will visit a witch to regain the love of her sweetheart, and the witch will make up a wax doll to represent the rival, which is placed before a blazing fire. While the wax melts, the old woman will utter some incantation implying that as the wax melts so the life of the rival shall come to an end. This riddance by fire is often replaced by stabbing with a long pin the breast of the wax figure.

Among the amusements, of which all classes are very fond, is the "passeggiata," especially on Sundays. It consists only in what we would call strolling, or promenading, about the streets, its principal purpose being that of showing off one's clothes, especially when new. A very childish and harmless amusement. Next to this comes the passionate love for the parish in which one is born, with the innate dislike and harred for the next parish or the neighbouring village, a traditional harred descended through countless generations since the Middle Ages, when civil wars were raging in every town. These disintegrating customs and passions have always rendered the unification of Italy a fould dream which seems never to be fully realized.

To speak of Italian customs without mentioning the Carnival would be the same as to speak of the tragedy of *Hamlet without Hamlet From the middle of January to the eve of Ash Wednesday the Carnival sends the whole population into hysterics of fun and frohe, when everybody can go about masked and diessed in the most ridiculous fashions, and can address and even insult with impunity whomsoever he likes. At inglit-time the fun goes on in the theatres and ball-rooms, a continuation of the ancient Saturnaha of the Romans, shared in by both sexes and by all classes. The City of Milan boasts of the great privilege, granted to its citizens by the Popes of Rome, of prolonging the follies of the Carnival for five days more than any other city of Italy, that is from Ash Wednesday to the first Sunday of Lent. This is called the "Carnevalone," when those who can afford it flock to Milan from many other towns to have more holidays.

A GOOD FRIDAY CUSTON BELLEGUARDO

The inhabitants of this district choose by ballot a man to represent Christ. He has to remain throughout Good Fridat standing erect on an ultar with a large cross hung from hist. Candles are placed near the altar and the people come to render him homast. They kneel before him chanting mounful himms and throw come into the large vessels placed in front of him. He distributes the collection among the sick and poor, whom he visits on Easter Day.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM. By CLIVE HOLLAND

HOLLAND is a quanit, and picture-sque country, and our readers therefore will not be surprised to find that there are quite a number of interesting customs surviving at the present day Among the most curious, and perhaps the most individual, are those in connection with the birth of children. In

> Friesland there are some very quaint customs still

when a son is born in a family all the friends of the mother lose no time in flocking to see her and crowding into her room, where they drink brandeavn from a special cup Each of the visitors should. by custom, bring with her a large tart of cake, and all these gifts sometimes numbering a score or more, are laid out in the room

The greater the mumber of tarts the better it is considered, for each of them is deemed to indicate the possession of a friend Soon after buth generally within a few days the new born baby is taken to church, all the guls of the family, and even of friends' families, of twelve years old and upwards forming a procession and accompanying the infant It is the privilege of these

The quaint head divises, which vary considerably in different localities, are the most characteristic features of Dutch costume. Volendam and Marken are famous for the picturesque diess of their inhabitants

one can casily unagine the uncomfortable amount of handling which the unfortunate infant undergoes As soon as the church is reached, the child is given into the arms of its father, by whom it is carried to the font A girl entitled to take part in the proceedings would not think of renouncing her claim, as she is proud, when she is married herself, to be able to say that she has taken part in this or that child's baptism, and there is a superstition also that all girls who have played a part in this christening ceremony will themselves, when married, be blessed with a quiveiful of children

girl chooses the man, and there is an old Dutch proverb regarding this practice which runs as follows. "There are only two things a girl may choose for herself, her lover and her potatoes". Court slip is fauly innestricted in Holland, guls and boys and young men and madens meeting freely in the tasks of daily life and at the village lete or kermesse. When a young man takes a fancy to a girl he one day puts on his bet things and goes holdly to her home. He generally has a welcome by the parents, if he is an eligible swain, and no one relas to the reason of his visit, although of course

CHILDREN'S DAY GHENT

On the third Sunday in Tuly children attending the Communal actions march through the streets of Glorit. The procession shows the national costumes and various tibleaux.

It is no secret. At last boltime comes, and the younger children retire and the father and mother also go to then own room, leaving the young people alone. The latter converse upon all out of topics, but not a word of love is usually intered, but if the girl allows the fire to die down it is taken as a sign that she does not care for the man, and is not disposed to look upon his courtship tayourably. On the contrary, it she heaps fuel upon the fire he knows perfectly well that his love is returned, and she means to accept him as her husband.

In Amsterdam there are many curious things in connection with weddings celebrated in the old church Hie most popular day in the week for adichiation of marriages is Thursday, because the fees are extremely low on that day, whilst on others it costs a good deal to be married. In connection with this particular church there is a man called the Koster, who is a himorist of no small parts. The weddings are celebrated within a little enclosure, and for covering the floor of this there are five different types of carpet, the hire of which runs from five guilders up to twentyfive, which sums are paid according to the wealth and the desire for display of the various contracting parties. The wedding-feast which follows the ceremony is the second which the bride and bridegroom have had to undergo, for in Holland, when the preliminaries of a betrothal are finally settled, a great feast is held. Generally the guests bidden to the wedding are invited by means of a box of sweets and a bottle of wine, known by the curious name of "Bride's Tears." For the wedding day itself there is a brand of wine used in which are found floating little grains of gold.

PROCESSION OF THE HOLY BLOOD, BRUGES
precious drops of blood is borne through the streets of Bruges

There is a quaint and cinious custom in parts of Holland relating to burial. At Hindeloopen, at all events, this obtains at the present day. In the chinich one finds a large number of biers, most of them prettily decorated and one set aside for the different trades. For example, there are biers for metal workers, cobblets, and bakers and a member of any of these trades will be carried to his last resting place upon his own particular bier, and ediquette would be outraged were any other to be used for the purpose.

The monring customs are very elaborate and ancient. In connection with this, there is an individual known as the anspecter who is an official of great importance. Dressed from head to foot in deepest black, he goes from house to house, visiting the homes of all those who have the slightest relationship or ties, brought about by friend ship or business, with the deceased, announcing the death. Sometimes the way in which the announcement is made has a touch of comedy in it, and it is not an unknown thing for it to take some such form as the follow-" I have to amounce, please, the butcher's compliments," or perhaps it is the grocer- " and he is dead," with the intimation of the time and place of the funeral. The anspiceker generally wears a white rosette when he carries round the news of the death of a child, and if the deceased is a bachelor or a spinster, he notifies the fact by the wearing of other decorations. A few years ago, and possibly the custom survives in remote districts at the present day, another individual, known as the heilebolk, went round with the ansprecker. Insidinty was to burst into tears when the announcement of the death had been made. The ansprecker also used to announce the arrival of little strangers, and in more ordinary attice he goes gaily from house to house when a birth occurs, making the fact known to friends of the family. There are, of course, many other customs of an interesting nature in Holland, but to describe these would need a small book.

Here is seen a group representing an episode in the life of St. John Berchnians in the annual procession. The Chapel of the Holy Blood at Bruges was founded in 1150 by Thierry d'Alsace and Sybilla d'Anjou, and is visited annually by thousands

There are many curious customs still surviving in Belgium, although, of course, the tendency here as elsewhere, is for them to gradually disappear or to fall entirely into disuse. In connection with the birth of a child, it is the custom of the parents, if well-to-do, to send to all their relatives and many friends a box of sugared almonds or sugar-plims, as a means of intunating the happy occurrence. In the case of a boy the box is tied up with pink ribbon, and in that of a gul, with blue

This custom, like many others, is being replaced in the higher grades of society by the sending of cards, and doubtless it will, in time entirely disappear. Instead of the mother or father, or both of them, deciding upon a name for the child, this is very frequently done by the godmother, who usually gives to it some family name or that of its patron saint

The Première Communion, which is as great an event in the life of a Belgian girl as it is with her French sister, takes place on two Sundays before Easter. The sliops are full of white dresses, veils, and stockings for the girls, and suits of black cloth, white gloves ties, and armlets of white satin ribbon fringed with gold braid, for the boys. On the Monday following the day of their First Communion the children are confirmed, and are then taken round to visit their friends, so that their new clothes can be admired and shown off. Many of the boys and girls of the upper classes receive presents of sweets, often consisting of little white sugar figures of boys and girls depicted in the act of saying their prayers, and often a feast, almost like a birthday or wedding party, is given by parents of the better class to celebrate the event.

In connection with Christmas there are quite a number of interesting customs still kept up. In Valley, or other funtful portions there is a custom of striking unfrintful trees with an axe, which is esteemed by the country-people to msine a good crop the next season.

In connection with New Year's Day in Belgium there are several interesting customs. The last day of the year is St. Sylvester's Day, and there is a custom in parts of Belgium that the child who gets out of bed last on the morning of that day is called by the name of the Saint, and is compelled to forfeit the best of its toys and gifts to its brothers and sisters. Girls, too, who have not finished any piece of work on which they are employed by the end of the year are said, in country districts, to run the risk of being hannted by spirits, perhaps the outraged spirits of Industry and Punctuality. The effect of such a belief, it may be hoped, is to lead to the finishing off of a lot of tasks that might otherwise be neglected indefinitely. Almost everyone pays calls on their friends on New Year's Day, and so universal and extensive is this custom that people who have a large circle of friends are compelled to devote almost the whole of the first of January to Belgians are particularly fond of pageants and processions, and that of the Holy Blood, which takes place on the second Monday following the 2nd of May each year at Briggs, is one of the most noted. It is the valley of the Meuse and in the Ardennes district in olden times before the introduction of Christianity, the mhabitants used to least at their midwinter festival on wild boar, so now at Namm. Dmant and other towns and villages in the Mense Valley they have pork for dimicr on Christmas Day, because the wild boar, although not quite extinct, does not exist in sufficient numbers to enable their to keep up the old custom in At Christmas time chestmits are used to foretell the future of young men and women who are betrothed They throw two chestmits into the fire. if they burn steachly the marriage will be happy, but if they split and hop out of the tric it is thought that the alliance will bring indiappiness. Lord's, has been in the small chapel dedicated to it for more than seven centimies, and the streets are throughd on the occasion on which it is carried in procession.

The Carmiyal is almost as important an event in Belgium as in France, and the week preceding Lent is known in Flanders by the name of "Directsweek," which means Devil's Week

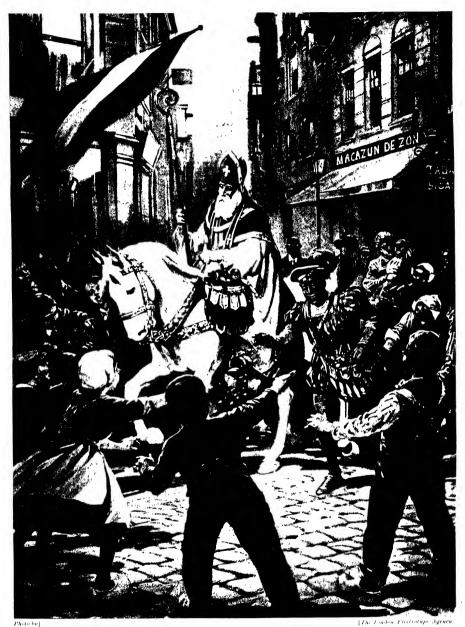

The evening of St. Martin's Day in Belgium is celebrated like the 5th of November with us, by the lighting of bonfires for the purpose, as the children say, of warming good St. Martin. On December 6th comes the festival of St. Nicholas, and on the eye of the festival Belgian children, before they go to bed, place their shoes or sometimes a small basket filled with hay and carrots near the chimney of their bedroom. St. Nicholas is supposed to ride through the sky over the house-tops

There are many other festivals in Belgium which it is impossible for us to describe owing to lack of space, but one must be mentioned—the curious festival of St. George at Bruges called the "Hammekens/cest" (Festival of the Ham) in connection with the Society of St. George—This association of archers holds a shooting-match in a hall where a supper-table is set out with various dishes, including ham, beef, salads and fish, and other eatables—A target is crected, divided into spaces, marked with the names of the various dishes, and the archers are permitted to help themselves to whatever eatable is marked upon the space which their arrows liit—When the arrow goes into the bull's-eye of the target, on which there is painted the figure of an ape, the man who hits it is allowed to choose any dish he pleases.

THE FESTIVAL OF ST NICHOLAS UTRECHT

On December 5th St. Nicholas indea through the sticets of Uirecht on a white horse with toys, for distribution at night, by his side. His attendant, Pirt, walking by his side, has aweets to scatter among the children, a birch for the naughty ones and a sack in which to hold them. The feast of St. Nicholas (Santa Claus) is the event of the children's year and there is a large demand for cakes made in the shape of a bishop. Christmas is reserved for the grown-ups.

CHAPTER XLVII

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, By D. H. MOUTRAY READ

INTRODUCTORY AND CUSTOMS RELATING TO BIRTH

British customs are as varied as the history of the land itself, and as interningled as the inhabitants. Some are common to all, some only to be found in places widely apart like the Channel Isles and the Hebrides. The locality is largely determined by the ancestry of the inhabitants. Thus the similarity of customs found in the Isle of Man and in Lincolnshire may be assigned to a Norse element in the population. Occasionally a custom was common to Celt and Saxon, for instance, iron as charm against witcheraft, which dates back to prehistoric days when non-conquered stone English customs are mainly connected with the calendar festivals. In Scotland the evil eye and second sight are paramount factors in Gache quarters, and legends take the place of feasts. Tales are told during the long writer nights by the men twisting heather ropes or mending sails indices, and these gatherings (Cerlidh) tend to preserve old tales, legends, songs, and behels. Oral transmission has equal importance in Iteland, where fairy-lore and fairy mischief are weighty influences. Music takes the place of story in Wales, and customs there are mainly concerned with marriage and death. Birth customs in Wales, and customs there are mainly concerned with marriage and death. Birth customs in Wales, and the South of Figland are few and unimportant, while they abound where the folk are dominated by faith in fairles and the evil eye.

The British Isles have no kindly stork to bring baby. The poet's "trailing clouds of glory" are in prosaic metaphor such uncomfortable localities as cabbage- and parsley-beds, gooseberry-bushes, or the doctor's bag. Locks are often unfastened when a buth takes place. In the Highlands anyone who enters the house must speak to the suffering woman, wish her God-speed, and in cases of difficult labour give something, such as water. That some pains of childbuth can be relegated to the father in the form of severe toothache or neuralgia is furnly believed by many country tolk. An Irishwoman will put on her husband's coat to make him share her pain, or his trousers to ease it. Almost everywhere the father is not allowed near his wife at the time of buth. Women friends assemble with the undwife, but no woman comes who is in what is called an "interesting condition," nor would one suckling an infant approach the bed, or the sick woman night be unable to feed her child when born. Should such unfortunate accident occur, her remedy is to get the offender's child secretly, and with a friend's help pass it under and over her

apton Hns should rectify matters In Conneniara nobody would take anything from the house while the woman wes laid up

To be born with a caulis lineky and so is spitting on and around the child Therefore this none too pleasant custom is indulged m largely In North-east Scotland, when a box is born he is wrapped in a woman's shirt, a gul in a man's, otherwise they would never marry - 1 he first food caten is important. Trish muses give salt, but sugar is more general, sometimes with butter The time of year, the hom, the day, then significance The infant's fate is forefold by the day of the week, as well-known thymes testify A child born atter midnight is supposed to have peculiar psychic powers. But in the West of Ireland midnight is dangerous, the infant born then must be promptly sprinkled with holy water, and be watched with extra caution for seven days, lest "the good people" change it, for famies have alarming powers over the new-born An unbaptized child is considered their easiest prey,

St GEORGE AND THE TURKISH KNIGHT

The old Munmers' Play is one of the most interesting features in British folk customs. The leyend of St. George is the putative theme, but the story acted is the world-old one of the death of a champion in single combat and his resuccitation at the hands of a wonderworker. The performers are called munmers, pace-eggers, guisers, or morris dancers, according to the locality and the season.

hence the many methods for its safeguarding. When "saining" mother and child in the north a fir candle is lift and carried three times round the bed, or, if impossible, round their heads A Bible is put under the pillow, also biscuits or bread and cheese, with the prayer, "May the Almichty debar a' ill frac this uniman, and be about n, an bless n, an n-bain." The Trish father is credited with special power to protect his offspring against fany mischief. In Galway he, not the minse, spits on the child, and elsewhere he minst remain in the house, for while his breath is within fairies cannot steal the child. Even his clothes offer measure of protection, and Scotch mothers will throw their husband's coat or waisteout over children to scenic them from haim. When baby is diessed first the Highland nurse turns it heds over head three times, blesses, and shakes it head down three times. This diastic treatment is her method of keeping off fairies. Trishwomen, if they take babies out after dark, wrap bread in bib or dress as a protection.

Many definite taboos exist for the first year. Baby's first step in the world must be "up," so if born at the top of the house a nuise will step on a chair with it before it goes downstairs. There is general objection to wash the inside of a child's hands lest luck be washed away. In England, north and west, the right hand is unwashed that it may gather wealth. Hair-cutting is also an affair of moment. In some parts of Ireland it is done first by a man. Nails are generally not cut for a twelve-month, nuise or mother will bite them, but if cut the child would be "light-fingered"—a thief. Children should never be measured or weighed.

This festivity is very similar to the one described by an old writer. "They cut hard justics from the marsh, which they make up into long bundles, and then dress them in fine linen, silk ribands, flowers, etc." These bundles are afterwards carried through the village and set down in the church, where they are stripped of their ornaments.

Frequently in the North, occasionally in the West, a feast is held on the birth night. Cheese figures nearly everywhere as a necessary item. In Border counties the "shooter" or "groamine cheese" has a "whang-o'-luck" cut from its edge by the father to divide in portions for all the girls present. He must not cut his finger or the child will die young. The girls put the cheese under their pillows to seeme dreams of future husbands. In Yorkshire "pepperscake" is caterwith the cheese. "Groaning cake" is the proper fare in Cornwill.

No child thrives, in popular estimation, before its christening. The choice of names rests often with the father, or depends or such a device as opening the Bible haphazard and taking the first read. A child born on a saint's day may be named after the saint almost invariably so among Roman Catholics—The name is often a secret till the ceremony takes place, and this facil avoidance of the use of Christian name often continues through life, women speaking of their bushands as "the master," "Mr — ," men of "the missus," "the wife", if frish or Scotch as "Hinrs lif" or "Herself". If a boy and girl are to be christened at the same time the gall will be brought forward first, as the boy might "leave his beard in the water" with disastrous results to the girl. In Wellcome church, near Morwenstow, a door, known as the Devil's door, is opened during the Baptismal service to allow the devil to depart from the child. The same idea, common in Gloricestershire, is attached to a door at Wroxall Abbey, though it has long been walled up. In the north the first person met on the way to the christening is given cake, or bread and cheese, usually with a "dram" of whisky. The cake offered is often some of the birth-feast cake. Generally the recipient should turn and walk a short distance with the party. This is called "Blessing the Baby" in Cornwall. In the North of England the gift of cake is made to the first woman met if the child is a boy, to a man when the infant is a end. No child should pay visits till christened. Gifts are made to the new born as well as the newly baptized. An egg, salt, silver or a match fire are the most general - After baptism in Guernsey baby is taken to visit idatives and the gift, prejerably an egg. should be put in its hands Visitors give the father money for luck threaten also the mother till she has been "chinched for "upraised, as they say in Cornwall, where mothers carry "grouning cake" with them to give the first person they meet on their way to church. An unchinched woman in the North of England is considered to bring ill-luck if she enters a house, and if lift or insulted out of doors is supposed to have no legal remedy. In the Hebrides no woman may work in her own home, much less enter a neighbour's. Free Kirk churches have no special service, but she aftends ordinary service in her best clothes wearing comething new if possible, and gives larger alms than usual to the poor. On her way home a neighbour will invite her in for refreshment, a needful custom where distances are great.

FISH HARVEST, ST MAGNUS THE MARTYR

Harvest Hanksprvings are the Church festivals that took the place of the old heathen harvest feasts and offerings of the first-fruits. Sheaves of wheat and barley, fruit and vegetables are used to decorate the country churches, and are afterwards given to the sick and poor custom seems merely that the child will have supernatural power over worms, which die at his approach.

There are certain things to be observed about the cridle. In Shropshire a child must not be in one till baptized. No properly instructed person would rock an empty cradle, for it promptly brings another occupant. In South Scotland, "Such rocking main bring on the babie disease." Both ideas are current in England. A cradle is never sent empty in the Highlands, a cock, hen, potatoes, or meal bag is placed in it, though without realizing this is a survival of ancient sacrifices. Also a cock of hen, por baby, must be the first occupant, and a cradle would be borrowed, and never bought, for the first horn.

With the innumerable charms for infant malades it is impossible to deal. Laith in such old remedies as the shrew-tree still linger and with faith practice. Men are alive to-day who in childhood were drawn through a split ash to cure rupture dren's teeth are covered with salt and binnt when they drop out, to prevent the second tooth being a "dog's" or "pig's" tooth. In the Hebrides fire may not be taken from a house wherein is a toothless child, or none might come, not must a child walk backwards, for fear such action shorten the mother's life

On the Welsh marshes children may not be beaten with willow because Christ condenined it to premature decay, as a local carol states, when the Virgin chastised Him "with a handful of bitter withy." In Shropshine it is considered the stunted broom would equally stop the child's growth. Hence the brich, tall and slender, is predestined for purposes of eastigation.

BLESSING THE WELLS TISSINGTON

The well dissuings which still continue in some parts are interesting survivals of the national worship of water spirits. The early Church absorbing local customs turned the heathen wells into holy wells and dedicated them to various saints, to whom were attributed the particular powers of the wells or springs.

CUSTOMS RELATING TO MARRIAGE

THE identity of the future mate is a question that, judging by the number of divinatory rites, the youth of the British Isles find hard to settle unaided, or too trying to patience to be left for time to disclose. Such divinations are practised from the Hebrides, where cabbage stalks are placed under the pillow to induce dicains of future partners, to the Channel Isles, where Guernsey maids visit St. George's Well fasting for inne mornings in silence, first putting silver in a niche, and then may expect to marry in nine times nine weeks. In old days a girl adopted the practical method of telling the priest, who duly summoned the man to meet her, and then married them. In the North and in the Isle of Man smoothed aslies in the grate overlight convey much information to the initiated next morning or a Many gnl - or Highland lasses on Hallowe'en, will go with mouth full or water and hands full of salt, to listen at the nearest house but one. She will marry a man with the first name overheard. An Irish gnl may walk three times round her looking-glass, and then stick an apple full of new pins in the Devil's name. Thereupon the person she is to marry should appear. Many divinations can only be practised on certain nights, chiefly on Hallowe'en.

Aberdeenshite girls make definite provision for marriage long before the bridegroom is known Feathers are collected for the bedding, the first earnings go to buy the Kist, recognized items of

When the wedding approaches the Welsh formerly sent a Bidder round to notify everyone concerned, a warming that a present was dire. This is now uperseded by more prosaic written announcements. Among fisherfolk in North cast Scotland bride and bridegroom personally myste their friends, and if any arc out, chalk a cross, equivalent to an invitation, on the door. In many places, it must above all be remembered to tell the bees, as they are told of death in the family, and in Guernsey white favours are put on hives for a wedding or black streamers for a death.

Luck depends on dates in marriage, as in birth, occasionally connecting the two. "Marry in May, no family," or "Ruc for aye," as the Border proverb runs. Lent and Fridays, the most unlucky times, are sedulously avoided, except in Wales and some places in the North where Friday is a favourite day. Many are the omens to be consulted, the things to avoid, to attain a "happy-ever after" conclusion, the weather, things met by the road, colours worn, with a general taboo on green extending in Scotland even to the vegetables on the dinner-table. For the bride's dress "Something old, something new, something borrowed and something blue" is usually correct, and she must not wear the dress beforehand, not even to try it on. In Yorkshire she would not task looking at it by candlelight.

In Ireland, unlike Scotland, courtship is unknown in the more primitive parts. Mailiage is a matter of contract between the parents, or the man and his father-in-law, he need never have seen his wife till the wedding day, but selects her for her dowry. Match parties are held just before Lent to bargam for a "boy" or a "girl," as the case may be. The matter is carried out without delay once the principal parties are satisfied with material prospects. The bridegroom and a friend, not forgetting a bottle of whisky, arrive late at night at the bride's home. The friend knocks and announces he "wants a wife." After long discussion through the shut door the suitor, if acceptable, is admitted. With much handshaking, blessing, and drinking a bargain is struck over the dowry, and then at last the girl may appear. If obdurate she might expect thrashing from father, mother and brothers in turn. Relatives are invited to supper next day and half the marriage portion is paid, the remainder with a cow will be given next year if a child be born. This dowry is often used to portion the bridegroom's unmarried sister. The wedding takes place a day or two later.

Throwing the bride's stocking, or the bridegroom's, as a "bedding" ceremony, once a general custom, now probably only lingers among Scottish fisher folk. They put a bottle of whisky with bread and choose in ped by the bride, which she hands found to the guests before throwing her stocking among them

In the Highlands a towel is placed on the bride's head when she arrives at her new home, and the contents of a dish of bread are poured over her, to be scrambled for by expectant children Shortbread is used for the same purpose in the North of England, and in some parts the thrower should be the oldest inhabitant available. annual practice (see illustration on page 1063). Eighteenth-century accounts describe the procession to the five wells to the reading of Psalms, Epistle and Gospel, and decorations of flowers stuck in damp clay arranged with mosaic effects, as to-day's. The Church turned pagan springs into Holy Wells, and renamed most, though some old names survive. Pins and rags stand for ancient sacrifices. Many an Irish well has scraps of clothing, sticks, even rosaries, hung near by on bushes (see illustration on page 1076). Garlands were always put round them, and pilgrims still visit the Holy Well in County Roscommon during August and September. All this points to behef and ritual prior to the Christian era, as does the cure for whooping cough at St. Teilo's Well in Pembrokeshire, where the water must be given in St. Teilo's skull by the heir of Llandeilo Farm. We even find a taboo on women connected with a well in an island off the Mayo coast. Women never draw water there, lest they die, and record fells that when all the male population were away fishing agoines of thirst were suffered by the women fill a man-child was born who could be carried to the well by the water-drawer.

These are purely English customs, but the festivals themselves date back to the Celtic seasonal feasts at commencement and completion of summer. The politico-religious celebrations have annexed bell-ringing and other customs from May Day and Hallowmas even as All Hallows is the Christian version of the heathen festival in honour of the dead. Fires on Hallowe'en are still lit in fieland, Scotland, and also the Isle of Man—where men are yet hired and land tenures fall in on that day. Hallowmas customs offer a typical blend of Christianity and paganism. Though an important Church festival, the customary observances sayour of pre-Christian practice. At Baseliurch their thyme runs, "Soul! Soul! for a himp of coal!" connecting the old Hallowe'en with the newer Guy Fawkes observances. "Bonfire Day" is an important anniversary in Ludlow, and still more in Sussex, where Lewes "Bonfire Boys" hold notorious revels. The "Guy" is a seventeenth century English addition, and, compared with the bonfire, of such minor importance that often it does not appear, though sometimes the opportunity is taken to burn unpopular characters, not necessarily historical, in effigy.—The Guernsey custom of burning le eveny bout de l'an approximates closely to Guy Fawkes, foreign to the Channel Isles. On the Borders fire is not permitted to go out on Hallowe'en, New Year's Day or Midsummer Eye, for if extinguished none would be given, or luck goes of stolen the fire is not holy. The same holds good in Ireland on May-Day Eye. Highland boys at Hallowinas went round cryms, "Ge's a peat t' burn the witches," and begged combustibles from the householders. One would be close to the me in the smoke, which the rest ran through to jump over him, till the fire burnt down, when ashes and peats were scattered and thrown about. In the Isle of Man witches are supposed to be very active on May-Day Eve. -Old Style - when ling and goise are fired to burn them out, as in Ireland spings of rowan or willow are stuck on doors or in the fields before sunset to protect the inhabitants, cattle and crops

The terrible details of the Clonmel witch-burning in 1895 prove belief in witchcraft is no mere thing of the past. It is affirmed not to be native in Ireland, however. There are black and white witches—the "Wise woman" with a little more insight and knowledge than her neighbours, and the witch proper, doer of evil, weaver of mischievous spells, who holds intercourse with evil spirits. Those who would become witches must cut themselves admit from the Christian faith by some unholy rite that puts them in league with the Devil. In Lincolnshire the power is supposed to pass from mother to daughter. Witches' evil work can be undone by "Charmers" and "Elf-doctors." This power passes from father to daughter, or mother to son in Manx behef. Wise women work many charms, elf-doctors are generally employed to cinc sick cattle. One in Counties Cavan and Leithin doctored sick cows by spanning them, and administering doses of 'crirls'" biewed with silver and elf-dart, a worked flint—in "three meatine water" taken up against stream where three townbands meet. In the Isle of Man herbs no boiled in milk, during which process the cattle make a noise and the sick should be cured. If the beast dies it is attributed to the evil eye, and the carease would be burnt in the open air. Boiling herbs also discovers the aggressor, for the first comer must have bewitched the beast and ventined their to fileh the heart from the carease, otherwise their power is lost.

In Scotland, north and west, in Man, and parts of Ireland, faith in the evil eye is a vivid belief. Anyone may have it especially women. A Mull woman described it as "an eye with great greed and envy." A person may have it and not be aware thereof. It causes sickness among men and beasts, prevents butter coming, and promotes general mischief. It damages others, but does not benefit the possessor, except instrictly through general disinchiation to retuse of a nov such persons. A look is sufficient to do harm, so they are sedulously avoided. It is dangerous to give

DEATH AND BURIAN

All such behefs in spirits as have been related above are very unorthodox, but nothing is less orthodox than the tolkbeliefs about death. In all is apparent a profound cicdence in spirit wanderings Death is assuredly the lying of Lerrors. and his shadow looms gricyously over the land His omens abound everywhere Exen a straw on the tail of a hen may be presage of death. If a cat in the Hebrides scratches the ground with her forepaws she is said to be seeking a corpse, and none in those islands would lift dead fish out of water.

lest someone dic, nor would they thatch with reeds from a lake, or death would come promptly to house or byte. For the same reason a ridge missed in planting potatoes or sowing turnips, or trees blossoning out of season, may be regarded with grave concern. In Ireland the Banshee wails for descendants of old families, the Dead or Deaf. Coach, the wraith, and many another supernatural happening foretell to country-folk an imminent departure from this world. In the North those driven by fear or curiosity to peer into the future will watch in the churchyard or porch at inidinglit on All Hallows, in some places. In Ireland a small straw bed is used which is burnt on the nearest hilltop after death, a signal to the neighbourhood, in the same way that prayers for the dead are sought by the mourners in the Hebrides who burn the sea-grass of the bed When a death takes place there are many customs commonly observed, such as opening the windows for the soul to escape -covering the looking-glass in the death-chamber. A plate of salt is generally placed on the breast of the corpse, occasionally beneath it, or some put a turl wrapped in paper. Most country folk will place a hand on the corpse, or they would see it—or rather the ghost—in future, and in Aigyllshine care is taken not to let a tear fall upon it, or harm awaits the weeper. Candles are often ht round the coffin, and on the Welsh borders one—there should be five—is left unlit—In other places three are lit, hence the belief that it is unlicky to be in the room with three lighted candles. When saming a corpse in the Lowlands, after it has been washed and lard out the oldest woman lights the candle—which must be obtained from a reputed witch or an "inducky" person and waves it three times round the corpse before measuring out three handfuls of salt on the plate upon the dead body. Three empty dishes are then put by the fire and everyone leaves the room, to return walking backwards repeating a saming thymic candle, placed on a table covered with a cloth, must burn all night Sometimes the watchers play cards, but the table must not be used the coffin hid is the correct thing — Information of a death is sull conveyed in places by tolling a bell The passing bell calls on the living to pray for the dying, and, incidentally, is held in many country places to highten away evil spirits In a Hampshire village bells at a funcial were said to warm St. Peter that a soul was coming Usually only one is tolled but where it is held that different bells highten different " we tolls 'em all to scare 'em all." is an important matter usually. In the North invitations are always personal, allaus of ceremony, but in Wales notice may be given publicly at church or chapel. Not only must friends be told, and the bees, but, maybe, other domestic stock. Where the bees are not formally told the hives may be lifted as the corpse is lifted to convey it to the grave, and in the North all beasts are let loose. Both in Treland and Scotland if an animal step over the corpse it would at once be killed.

Grave-digging in fielding is avoided on a Monday, nor must there be a change of diggers. The position of a grave varies in different places. In some it is held that the north-east corner is the "Devil's corner," and therefore to be avoided, or left for suicides, panjers and unchristened infants.

The prejudice against suicides, and in a lesser degree the unchristened exists everywhere, also a reluctance to bury in a new graveyard. Highlanders always desire to be buried among relatives, and bodies will be brought great distances to be put alongside their own people. In Ireland

Sometimes in the West of Ireland men dressed as women, and wearing straw masks and occasionally "straw petitionts," go to dance at weddings. oars of a boat, and then the procession sets out on its long march to the distant burial-ground. The coffin is borne by able-bodied neighbours, the "first-lift" in some places being reserved for female relatives and friends. The bearers relieve each other, either in shifts, the retiring giving place to the next four couples of the procession and falling in at the end, or as fancy takes them, one by one, those nearest being the first to give up. Wherever the coffin rested a pile of stones binial in special places may be done to secure such benefit by binial adjacent to some reputed saint as will result in prompt entity into Paradise. This is why at Glendalough every available inch is more than crowded near St. Keyin's grave should be erected. To carry it shoulder high in the Highlands is a mark of respect. Refreshments are again provided after the grave has been filled in, and while the principal people may retrie to a neighbouring house for tea the majority of the company sit and smoke and gossip on the grass. Roman Catholies in the Outer Isles throw a committo the grave, to pay toll to the earth. In Ireland the come are collected as "offerings" for the priest, or to pay for Masses for the dead, and the offram, or "Parson's Penny," is the Welsh parallel. Welsh dinges, the melancholy wail of the Highland pipes, are exchanged in the sister isle for the lond keening of the women. Each fresh arrival at the house of mourning would start a keen, a versified lamentation for the dead. In the South of Ireland the number of professional keeners present is test of respectability. The dead are also honoured by the amount of whisky and tobacco provided for the wake. Possibly the day ends with contests of skill.

This cross is an interesting example of a pagan sacred object turned to the uses of Christianity by the early missionaries. But men still think that they will prosper in marriage if they touch the hole in the shaft.

Nearly everywhere it is the rule that the corpse be carried to the grave by the main road, that followed by the deceased in their lifetime, but this is varied in Ireland where the mounters desire to go by the longest possible route By roads are usually avoided, unless they are recognized 'corpse roads,' probably because they are the older roads, and the popular notion is that the passing of a funeral establishes a right-of-way hence quite recently on a new "Private Road" in a southern watering-place a notice debarred finicials passing

MISCELLANLOUS CUSTOMS

SPACE forbids mention of the many interesting manorial customs, such as the payment of cent in kind, keyhole and other tenures, the contradictory rights of the elder or the younger son—primogeniture and Borough English—that exist side by side in some places. Nor can we enter into civic customs, sports and school customs, though they are all, in their several ways, distinctly British But as pertinent to the foregoing a word may be spared for sindry old customs that still linger in the country places where up-to-date methods and manners penetrate but slowly—Among these we may note those that concern, with local variations of procedure, the treatment of the matrinounally unfaithful—The great aim of all these, be they "Wooset" or "Ooset-hunting," "Riding the Stang," "Stag-riding," or "Skimmington-riding," is to render the delinquents uncondictable, and publicly ridiculous—Usually the effigy of the offender is carried with "tin-pot misic" and the singing—or rather shouting—of abusive doggerel, through the village to the door of the victim's house—After a demonstration there the effigy, or "mawkin" as they would call it in Shropshire, is taken to some adjacent spot to end on a bonfire

Cases of wife-selling are still known, and not many years ago a Sheffield woman was thus disposed of by her husband for one shilling. Instances also occurred at Weylill and other fairs, the undesired wife being taken there with a halter round her neck, and handed over to any bidder in exchange.

for some small com of the realm. Wife-selling, however, can hardly be considered a general custom at tars, but the hiring of servants and labourers is saill the nominal reason for the holding of Mop, or hiring, Lairs.

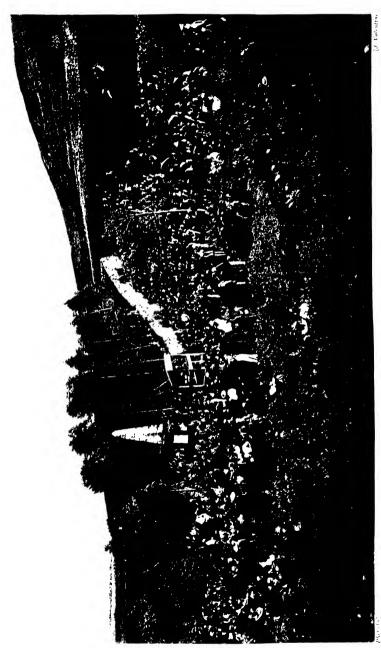

Faus, we know, were once held in the churchyards of some of our villages, and though long discontinued the testival, if not the market, lingers vet in many places. Village wakes, feasts and revels, held on the day of the patron saint, are characteristically English customs, few of these calendar teasts are general throughout the British Isles, they are peculiarly local. Games also vary with locality. Some are widespread, as the Christinas Mummers, or Ginsers' Play, and the Midsimmier

CHAPTER XLVIII GERMANY, By CHARLES RUDY

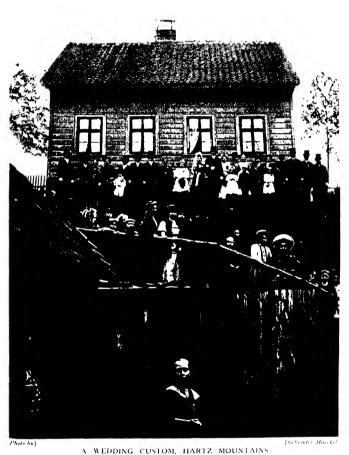

Germany, or that irregular field of colour on the map of Europe which we call Germany, is wonderfully rich in folk lore and peculiar local customs that vary from place to place like the colours of a chequered mosaic. In other words, there is no numformity between north and south, between east and west. The Bayarian has nothing in common with the Prussian beyond some lax political ties, and the dweller on the Rhine is a different being from him who lives within sight of the North Sea. The German language and a common political ideal hold them together, but in the bottom of his heart the "Schwab" is a "Schwab," and not a German, and a Prussian is a Prussian, with little to unite him to his neighbours of Wurtemberg or Baden.

There are customs and beliefs, however, that are common to all Germans. Beginning with childhood, we have the general belief that storks bring the babies into the world. Those big, ungainly birds are supposed to sit beside a point fill of little babies, waiting to carry them off, one by one, to empty cradles. The stork figures, therefore, largely in popular songs and anecdotes, he is, moreover, a bird of good omen (as opposed to the woodpecker, which is an unlucky bird), and his advent in the spring is halled with delight, to destroy a nest—and some of them, more particularly those perched on square-topped towers, are centuries old, would be to invite disaster if not a conflagration, for among its other attributes, the stork is a safeguard against fire

Another animal that plays a somewhat considerable rôle in chi'd-life is the hare, whose cult, if such it can be called, is restricted to Easter. The "Osterhase" is the emblem of reawakened nature, of the snows that melt and the flowers and fruit that grow, as such it is a survival of the pagan spring festival when the birth of nature was universally féted, the hare being regarded as the symbol of fruitfulness. To heighten the picturesque significance of spring, coloured eggs were hidden, and are still hidden to this day in meadows and gardens, and children and grown-ups go around looking for them, especially for the red ones, which are considered lucky. As for the hare, his likeness is still everywhere in evidence on Easter Sunday.

The coming of spring, and the death of the long, dreary winter, is celebrated with greater joviality

in Germany than anywhere else In certain parts of Westphaha a tiery ball is rolled down a hill another pagan smyrval, the ball being symbolic of the acturn of the sun. In many parts dummines representing King Prost are publicly burned, the people dancing and singing, and the incvitable German band joinmg in the fantaic. A VINIAGE CUSTOM In all countries where grapes are grown for wine, the vintage season is marked by a frank bonhome that is reminiscent of pagan customs and superstitions

Carmyal celebrations are not general in Protestant Germany, but in Bayaria and the Rhineland, both of which are Catholic, they are feted with the same mad hilarity as in the Latin countries. In some rural districts Shroye Tuesday, or the first Sunday in Lent, is characterized by a strange ceremony, namely, the "Finikenfeuer". A bonfire is lit in which slabs of wood with a hole in the middle are burned until they are a red ember. A stick is then inserted in the hole, and they are thrown into the air and fall in a shower of sparks.

In the might of April 30th, known as Walpuigis Night—the night when, much like Hallowe'en with us, witches wander about seeking to wreak haim—the cautious farmer who, in his heart of hearts, is not quite sure whether witches and spooks really exist or not, will not fail to shoot a guishot into the ini or light a bonfire to keep away the undestrable." thinks it wiset (at least, it can produce no harm) to liide some elderwood, which is supposed to be an antidote against witch poison, in barn and granary. As a matter of fact, rural Fritz is as superstitious as rural Gretchen, who washes her face in dew or in March, snow water to make heiself goodly to the eyes of her lover. No sooner has Fritz built his homestead than he follows the custom of his fathers—he burns some pions wish or motto on the beams that support the roof, and thus are disasters such as fire and financial rum avoided.

Speaking of Gretchen reminds me that, after all, woman plays the same all-important rôle in the life of the German nation as she does at home in England. As a child, the German woman, like her brothers, leads a simple life. The first step out of childhood is taken when Gretchen is confirmed. She then receives a black silk diess, flowers adorn her, and her path to the church is strewn with flowers. Much more importance is attached to the ceremony of confirmation in Germany than in any other country, and after the religious service the parents of the child keep open house for the remainder of the day in order to receive the congratulatory wishes of all friends and acquaintances.

To spoil their game, as it were, glasses and crockety are thrown against the door of the house where the bride resides, and, falling to the ground with a crash-prevent the hobgoblins from telling their spiteful tales.

As regards Germany's men, imilitarism plays a most important part in then lives. But there is one feature that is deserving of special comment, because peculiar to Germany, and that is student life. All German students who respect themselves and are of good family belong to some 'varsity society, or "Korps.—These, of which there are many in all university cities, are a highly organized and picturesque form of college masonity remanscent of the medieval struggle of scholars against their oppressors.—Discipline is the key note of these organizations, direlling is the ordeal through which each incident has to go, and beer-drinking is the letimotif—The sign of the "Korpstudent" is the ribbon of two or three colours (according to the wearer's rank) thrown obliquely across the waistcoat, a coloured cap, and one or two "Schinisse" (cuts from the duelling sword) across his face. The vogic of duelling is, certainly, barbarous, but there is nothing ellenmate about it. It can be provoked in many ways, student honour being a sensitive plant. For one "Korpstudent" to regard another fixedly may be taken by the latter as a provocation, and a "Mensur" (duel) is quickly arranged in some out-of the way place where the police are not likely to interfere. The ordeal can be of many degrees of severity, with pistols, sabres, or German rapiers, the latter being the most usual. In a rapier "Mensur" the combatants stand firm within a sword's length of each other, the fighting arm bent up over the head, only the face being left unprotected. At the word "Los" the rapiers begin their play, and the sight is theatrical

The choral songs sung on this occasion slow-moving and solemn, like anthenis in a minor key, add to the sentiment of the scene When it is remembered that the actors in the scene are youths without a man to guide them, it will be understood that the spirit of discipline which has given Germany her armies is inherent in her youth

Beside each combatant crouches his second, tapier in hand, evening the adversary for any infringement of the rule (the first of these is that the body and head must remain motionless). If the second detects any such infringement, quick as a flash of lightning he interposes his blade and complains to the unipne. The duel lasts until blood has been drawn a clean, razor like cut across check, chin, forchead, or head

Intimately related with the more joyral side or student life are the drinking songs and customs of Germany. In wine growing districts the vintage season is apt to be a good natured bacchanale, the March brew of Munich beer is no less an occasion for hilarity For the German is essentially a joy of drinker who drinks his long-stemmed glass of Rheinwein or his mug of beer for companionship's sake When men clink then glasses together, they look each other straight in the eyes and say * Prosit* , if the glass is being drunk in honour of some particular occasion, it is emptied nr a single draught in extravagant encles the glass is thrown on the floor students the most impressive scene is the "Totenmesse," accompanied by a solemn "Salamander". CHAPTER XLIX

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY, By OSCAR BRILLIANT

Ith life of the peoples inhabiting the Anstro Hungarian monarchy affords is an exceedingly interesting study. For centuries this great state of Central Europe, with its varied physical characteristics, ranging from vast. Alpine regions to the boundless plans of the busila, has been the meeting-place of East and West, and the dwelling-place of the three great races of Europe—the Germans, the Latins and the Slays—To make the picture still more varied and complex, each race is divided into a number of branches, consisting of peoples having separate language, religion, traditions and customs. Thus among the Germans we find representatives of the Saxons, Franks and Suabians, the Latins are divided into Italians and Rimianians, and the Slavs are divided into Czechs, Poles, Ruthenians, Slovaks, Croatians and Servians. And in the midst of them live other peoples belonging to different races altogether. Such are the Hungarians, who, coming from Asia a little over a thousand years ago, have consolidated themselves here into a powerful nation.

We meet these various peoples chad in their own national and highly picturesque costumes, we find them passionately clinging to their national and religious sentiments, and we see them greatly attached to their ancient modes of life and to their old custom. It is in the rural districts that the national characteristics of the people have been most strongly developed, and it is amongst the peasants that the national customs have been most faithfully preserved. For this reason, the customs, beliefs and superstitions we describe in this article are, with few exceptions, those found amongst the peasant population of Austria-Hungary

In connection with birth, marriage and death, we find a great number of customs, some of which are of very ancient origin, and which faithfully reflect the character of the people

When an interesting event is expected in a family, the first thought of the parents is the selection of the godparents who will preside at the christening of the child. The couple thus selected greatly appreciate the honour, for it is considered a great distinction to have as many godehildren as possible. The godparents give the child, among other presents, a bag containing one silver com and three copper ones which is carried by the baby during the baptism. This money must not be touched by anyone, but it is prescrived for the child, and forms the basis of all lutine savings in the child's favour. This is a custom prevailing among Germans. It is believed that the child is exposed to a great number of dangers until it is baptized. Thus it can be taken possession of by a witch, or by other bad fames, and can be adversely affected in a great number of ways. After the baptism the head is not bathed for a period of nine days in order not to wash off the chrisin.

The behef that children are exposed to the dangers of the "cyclexic" is common to all the peoples of Austria-Hungary. Many devices are used in order to guard the child from its cyclemfluence. Thus, when one looks at the child, one makes the sign of the cross over it, or pretends to spit at it.

It is customary among the Ruthenians to observe certain ceremonics when presenting the wedding gifts to the bride. Here we see some of the bridesroom's gifts carried to the bride's house by the "starosta" and the best man or pulls its nose. In some places the child is bathed in a decoction of special herbs, in others a wolf's tooth is field round its neck. Another common device is to tie a red tibbon round the arm of the child, or to put on one of its garments on the wrong side.

People believe that children who bring their name into the world with them -that is, those who are named after the saint whose festival falls on the day they are born or those who are born on a Sunday in which the new moon begins, are licky, and are endowed with great powers of divination, and are able to recognize and therefore to avoid witches and other exil influences. The Austrian peasants believe that the house in which a child sleeps is safe from being strick by lightning. During a thunderstorm they therefore put to bed the youngest child in the house.

The enstoins relating to marriage among the Germans, although possessing on the whole a great amount of similarity, vary greatly in the different provinces of the empine. But even within a province we find some characteristic differences and some peculiar customs which are used only in certain localities. We will mention as many of these customs as the limited space at our disposal will allow us. Although marriages of affection are not much rarer here than in any other part of the world, a marriage is to a great extent a financial question. Amongst most of the peoples of Austria-Hungary the bride is not "given away" but "sold". The parents give her, of course, a dowry proportionate to their means, but, on the other hand, they must receive from the bride-groom's family a compensation in money or kind for the loss of their daughter.

Even if the young man has already fixed upon his choice and is certain of the gul's acceptance, it is customary to arrange the marriage through the mediation of a special man, and in some places of a special woman, known under various names, but all of them signifying the marriage intermediary or broker. When the proposal is accepted by the girl and her parents, a day is arranged on which the prospective bridegroom and his parents pay a visit to the girl's house. Although the purpose of this visit is well known, some excuse, such as the briving of cattle or a similar thing, is made. After all the financial and other details have been discussed at length and settled, supper is served. On this occasion, the prospective bridegroom gives the girl a present in the presence of the parents. In some parts it is usual for the voining man to bring a call, which he leaves in the cowshed. This call is beautifully decorated on the wedding day.

The invitation to the wedding is a very formal affan, and is made by a special man, called "der

RUTHENIAN WEDDING CUSTOM

The evening before the wedding many extensions take place in the bride's house. Hochzeitbitter," that is, the man employed to invite the guests to the wedding. When going on this errand, his hat and stick are decorated with flowers and ribbons, and in inviting each guest he uses a rather long and special formula, which varies slightly in different localities. Speaking of the invitation to the wedding, we will mention a very curious custom which prevails in the district of Wechsel, in Lower Austria. Here the bride herself is also invited to the wedding. The bridegroom, accompanied by the best man, both clad in their gala costume, calls for that purpose at two or three in the morning at the bride's house. On that occasion the bride must not be surprised sleeping, nor must she be found too soon. The first case would signify that she would not make a careful housewife, and the second one that she is too eager to get married. She hides herself, therefore, and the longer the search for her lasts the more honoured she feels.

On the Simday preceding the wedding friends assemble at the bride's house for the purpose of making the bridal wreaths and the bouquets for the wedding party. This is followed by a banquet and dance. In some districts the brides trousseau and downy are carried to the bridegroom's house on that occasion but in other districts this is done after the wedding.

In most districts the bridgeroom and his party go to the brides house whence they proceed together to the chuich This tetching of the bride to church is accompanied by many ennous customs. Thus in some districts the wedding party find the gates locked, and it is only admitted after some negotiations have taken place and the bridgeroom has thrown over the fence money, which usually contains some old and uscless coms After breakfast has been served to the guests the bride takes leave of her parents, thanks them for all the favours she has received, asks forgiveness for all the wrongs she has committed, and kneeling down, receives their blessing

On coming home from church, the wedding party finds the door locked, and the best man has to ask permission from the house guardians generally two young men, to enter. After this is granted, one of them offers the guests a bottle of wine, and the other presents to the bride a loaf of bread and a wooden kinfe, and asks her to ent off a piece. The bride is then subjected to a great deal of good humoured chaff for her predicament, but as she has already foreseen that, she takes out from her pocket a penkinde, and cuts off the corner. This the stores carefully away in order that the new household may never suffer from want. She then throws away the wooden knife, taking care to throw it towards the house, not backwards, for this is supposed to bring luck to her house

The wedding banquet is everywhere a very elaborate affan, and is followed by a dance. In some parts of Upper Austria this is opened by the bride jumping on the table, which is laden with dishes, plates, glasses, etc., and walking towards the bridegroom or the best man, taking care not to upset or break anything on the table, for this would be considered a bad onen for her married life. But while she successfully accomplishes this feat, one of the guests upsets a glass of water, and she is then jokingly taunted with the deed. This custom was formerly more common than it is to-day, when it is mostly observed in Upper Austria.

The Hungarians are very fond of show, and so their wedding ceremoines, feasts, and celebrations are of a more elaborate character than those prevailing amongst the other nationalities of Austria-Hungary. After a marriage has been arranged in the usual way, that is, through the mediation of the marriage broker sent by the would be bridegroom, the young man visits the house of the girl's parents for a special function, called the "hand-taking". On that occasion all the financial and other details are settled, presents are exchanged, and a feast closes the proceedings. This is followed later by the formal engagement, called also the "kissing-feast," at which the couple sit side by side in public for the first time, and are allowed their first embrace.

The invitation to the wedding is performed, just as amongst the Germans, by a special man. His stick is decorated on that occasion with a red apple and a stem of rosemary, and it has tied

We might just as well notice here that handkerchiefs play a pronuncut part in all the festive functions of the Hungarian people given as presents on all possible occasions, and serve in a variety of ways as decorations at baptisms, weddings and other religious festivals

We will describe now several of the characteristic customs of the Czechs, Poles, Ruthennaus,

Croatians and Slovaks Amongst all these peoples a marriage is always at ranged by the mediation of two representatives of the would be budegroom's family These persons, whose object is perfectly well known to the parents of the gul, because the day of the visit is arranged beforehand, begin by stat. ing that they are in search of a precious jewel greatly desired by the son of their friend As they have good reason to believe that this may be found in the house, may they ask permassion to look for it Thi is naturally granted, and a regular search through the house begins After a little while the blushing maiden is found and brought into the room and after a few compliments have been paid to her she is allowed to re-111 c Then the bargain, about the bride's dowry, her purchase price and the other details, is settled, and the proceedings end with a feast differs a little from that just described above. The bridegroom arrives at the bride's house only after all the arrangements between the parents and the representatives of the two respective tamilies have been completely settled. The girl is then brought in, and the young man hands her an apple, while she gives him in return a handkerchief. We may just mention that in much of the Croatian poetry a gul is likened to an apple

before the marriage the bride calls upon her neighbours, taking with her a cake specially prepared for that occasion. On entering each house, she breaks off a piece, which she offers with the invitation to attend her wedding. Usually the bride also asks forgiveness for whatever wrongs she may have computted, and receives the blessings of the elder members of the family

Another interesting custom amongst, the Slovaks is the following. Just before the bride is leaving for church, she is led by her mother to the kneading-trough, which is covered with a piece of new linen. Upon this she seats herself, and her mother cuts off three locks of han, which are solemnly burned, and the ashes scattered in all directions.

Several interesting costons are found among the Ruthemans. Before the wedding coremony

the bride is dressed by the bridesmaids. While she is sitting on a chair in the middle of the room they put on her head a wreath made of artificial flowers, more or less gift, and trimined with coloured ribbons, and during the whole time they sing certain songs of a rather inclancholy inclody.

It is the usual custom among the Slavonic peoples for the bridegroom's party to go to the bride's house, and to start together to church. Amongst the Ruthemans, after the ceremony is over, while the wedding party goes to the bridegroom's house or to the village inn, the bride returns home with the bridesmands and her gul friends. Here they all sing many special songs, until the bridegroom arrives. But he is not let in, and he has to buy his way, and when he at last comes in the room he finds his bride between two brothers or male relatives, and he has to buy her out again.

A WEDDING PROCESSION, NORWAY

A wedding procession on the water is a common socht in the food districts of Norway and Sweden. The briefe wear a videor will bitle trown from which han salver come and small trinker. These ring pretrik like small bell, when the wearer move. A fiddler and two brides women it company the bride.

The characteristic feature of a Rutheman wedding is the so-called "korowa₁". This is a large loaf prepared and baked under the auspices of relations and friends invited for the purpose, and who sing special songs while the baking is in progress. The load is anomed with ornaments made of pastry. Then a little tree is creeted in the middle of this and a wax candle fastened to it. Besides this "korowaj," smaller loaves of the same shape are made. After the wedding ceremony the children, who thank him for all the kindnesses they have received, and ask forgiveness for the wrongs they have committed. Afterwards come the friends and neighbours, who also ask for forgiveness. In some districts this cereinony takes place at the graveside.

After this the collin is nailed, and is carried three times in the form of a cross over the threshold, the carriers saying, "Praised be Jesus Christ!" and all answer, "For ever, Amen!". The body is always carried out of the house toot forwards, for if the dead should look back in the house, the people believe that someone of the family is sure to die within a short time.

Christmas, New Year, and Easter are productive of many curions and interesting customs. To the Slavonic peoples, Christmas is not only a season of feasting, but one in which the mysterious forces of nature act with redoubled energy. They perform at that time a great number of ceremonies with the object of rendering these mysterious forces harmless or of propitiating them. Amongst the Slovaks the cottage and excrything it coatains is thoroughly cleaned and washed, and in the afternoon of Christmas Eve the floor is covered with clean straw from last year's harvest. The whole family assembles in the living room and then proceeds in solemn procession to the stable, cowhouse, etc., carrying with them bread and salt and a bowl filled with beans. As they move along, some of the beans are slipped into the cracks and crevices in the walls, and an incantation is recited, which is supposed to protect the house from fire. The bread and salt is offered to the cattle, clickers, and the other domestic animals, and it is considered a good omen when none of them reject the proffered gift. Returning to the house, where the Christmas feast has already been laid on the table, the parents sprinkle their unimarried daughters with water which has been sweetened with honey. This is supposed to have the effect of procuring for them husbands whose honesty should be as transparent as water, and whose temper should be as sweet as honey. Then before the feast begins, another ceremony takes place. The father fills for every one present a glass with the national drink, and after each has supped a little of it, poins the remainder on the straw-covered floor as a libation to the "unknown gods".

Amongst the Poles and Ruthenians careful preparations are also made for this festival, which lasts till after Epiphany. On Christmas Exc the corners of the living-room are decorated with all kinds of cereals, and the table is covered with hay

As a rule Ruthenian churches air made of timber, especially in the mountains. The mountainers are skilful woodcutters, carpenters and builders. This pho ogiaph represents a church during holy service. It is filled up, and some women are kneeling or sitting out of doors.

The Easter festivities are also very gay and accompanied by very interesting local customs as a rule, all these peoples do not eat meat during Lent. Amongst the Ruthenians the different dishes prepared for the Easter feast are curred at daybreak to the square in front of the church in order to have them blessed by the village prict Several special customs are observed dining the teast itself. Hors before the meal starts the head of the family takes up the large white loat, called " paska, " which has been specially baked for the occasion, and after having made with the knife the sign of the cross upon it, cuts several small pieces, which he distributes amongst those present These pieces are immediately eaten, care being taken not to drop any crumbs on the floor, for this is considered a great

SWITZERLAND. By Professor E. HOFFMANN-KRAYER

The various strata of culture in Switzerland have left noticeable traces, not only in the physique and the language, but especially in the behels and customs of the people, so that we often find a ningling of pagan, Roman, and Christian elements—The constitution of the country is also favourable to the development of local peculiarties, the twenty-two cantons being independent sovereignties we must note that no tewer than four languages are spoken and written in Switzerland German, French, Italian and Rha to Romanc. each of which is subdivided into a great number of spoken dialects, and that the great diversity in climate and soil produces very marked differences in views and modes of life

Let us begin with the three landmarks of human existence—birth, marriage and death

According to genuine Swiss nursery belief, babies are hammered out of rocks, or taken out of springs, or they come out of trees or bushes, or are found under the cabbages in the garden. The midwife opens the rock with a golden key, or she walks round it three times, whist hig, if she does not leave off whist-ling during the walk she will find a box.

In Berne, a woman about to be confined would put on her husband's uniform, which was supposed to facilitate the process. Immediately after birth the child was placed under the settle or table, "to preserve it from evil spirits all its days."

The present costumes of Switzerland differ widely that of Brine is among the most noted. In some districts special bridal dresses are kept in the parish house and lent to those too poor to buy them.

At Lenk, it is wrapped in its father's shirt, to ensure his loving it. Many are the protective measures applied to the baby in its cradle or bassinette, for as long as it was not baptized, it was much more at the mercy of evil powers. A cross was drawn on the cradle, or a knife stuck into it. As soon as the child is born, the news is sent to friends and neighbours by the "Frendmeith" (literally joy-girl), who goes about with a bonquet on her dress, ornamented with a red ribbon for a boy and a white one for a girl.

Among the many significant engagement usages we may mention one from the Zermatt Valley by which the parents of the lass give their consent to the match by silently offering the suitor a taste of their old family choose. In Val Verzasca, the courting was done by a symbol, the suitor placed a log of wood before the maiden's door, if she took it indoors, she thereby signified, her acceptance of his addresses, if not, he had to consider himself rejected. This custom doubtless goes back to ancient ideas as to the suicity of the hearth fire.

The promise of marriage was confirmed by clasping hands or by the young people drinking wine from one glass, or cating from one plate or with one kinde and fork, to symbolize the community of all things in marriage. During the time of the engagement, the couple are not allowed to go out of doors in the evening after the Augelus, else evil spirits will have power over them.

In many places the groom goes to the bride's house early on the day of the wedding, escorted by his best man, who knows on the door. Those within ask who is there and what is wanted, and after a long discussion the door is opened and the best man enters to claim the bride. The groom waits outside, and the best man reappears with a hideons old maid, whom the horizined bridegroom refuses to look at. Next comes a faded grandmother, and so on, even straw figures and all sorts of jokes being offered, till at last the real bride appears. In Sobiro, Tessin, the groom himself has to enter the house at last, to look for his bride, and it is good form for the bride to hide as well as she can, so as not to make his himt too easy.

In Values, certain parishes own special costimes for the bride and groom, which are kept in old carved chests in the parish house, and lent to couples to a poor to afford the expense of buying the prescribed garments. As a general rule, however, the bride wears a white apron, and the bridely wreath, the emblem of virginity, if she has forfeited the right to this her wreath is made of straw

The cantonal parliaments in the open our which are still recognized officially in several cantons of Switzerland at the present day, are of old standing. They assemble late in April or early in May, and are attended by every citizen

A GUILD FESTIVAL ERMATINGEN

When craftsmen unite to form guilds and corporations their festivals become very elaborate. That of the fishermen of Ermatingen (shown above) is well known, but the most famous is the vintners' lestival at Vevey.

The bride and groom are admonished to stand close together during the ceremony, else the devil will step in between and make trouble. When the procession leaves the church, the village children block the way, and take toll before allowing anyone to pass. In Vand, wheat is thrown at the bride, an antique rite supposed to promote fecundity.

In Grisons, the bridal party, on arriving at the house, find the door closed, and prolonged parley is necessary to obtain admittance for the young master and his wife. As a rule the wedding feast follows immediately after the ceremony, and all sorts of meriment enlivens the incal. One very common custom is that of "slice stealing", two lads prefetid to have dropped something, and,

Every spring an effice, made to represent Winter is ceremoniously burnt at Zurich. Great crowds assemble to welcome by this symbolic act the season of truit and flower, the renewal of the world's fertility while stooping down for it, contrive to steal one of the bride's shocs. The best man, whose business it would have been to prevent the theft, has to pay a ransom for the bride's property

Naturally, all manner of popular beliefs and superstitions are connected with death, some of their dating back to remote times, and embodying religious views of venerable contiquity. Thus, in some places, the windows are opened immediately after death, so that the soul can fly out, immore are covered with black gauze. If the father of a family dies, the wine in the cellar must be shaken, or some one must knock at the barrels, else the wine will turn sour. Flower-pots and bee-hives must be moved, or the flowers and bees will perish. The bees must be told of the master's death. There must always be water in the house at the moment of a death, so that the soul may bathe

The needles used to sew up a corpse in a sheet have magic power, if put in a gun, every shot tells; through the eye, one can see spirits, the nails of a coffin, too, are valuable as charms. The pailful of whipped cream is brought in, half of it eaten and half spattered about among those present. The idea is that this will cause an abundance of milk on the farm (magic by analogy).

A subject that is often discussed and almost as often imsunderstood is the custom known as " kiltgang," visits paid by lads to their lasses at hight. The word "Kilt" originally meant "evening," and was not restricted to lovers' rendezvous. The manner of it varies according to the region, and especially accordmg to the degree of intimacy of the parties As a rule the "Kilter" climbs the woodpile under the maiden's window, knocks on the pane and begs admittance, often in a jocular address full of builesque nonsense. If the girl likes lum, she opens the window, sometimes after prolonged hesitation, and offers him a glass of wme or brandy on the window sill nightly meetings are sometimes disturbed by so-called " night-boys," and the lover, especially if he comes from another village, is hauled out, mocked and occasionally ill-treated bandkerchief used to wipe the brow of the dead is wound round the trink of a tree to increase its fruitfulness, and the water with which a dead body has been washed is similarly used.

It is customary to bury some object or other with the dead, in some places this gift consisted of wine-bread and cheese. Jewellery times and carrings is buried with those especially beloved, mothers dead in childbed are given a thumble and a pocket kinfe. An engaged girl is buried with a myrite wreath, the mother's briefal wreath is laid in the coffin of the first child she loses.

Among noteworthy customs on imperant dates in a person's life, we may mention be odd one of pretending to choke the bearer of a saint's name on his name-day probably a trace of the old custom of hanging name-day presents on one's neck

We will now turn to village life and its characteristic isages. The gatherings on winter evenings are well known. A special form of these are the cream-rights," when a whole

VILLAGE CUSIOMS

ST. NICHOLAS Several of these Nicholases run through the villages pursued by the inhabitants imbued with solemn and majestic poetry - The real Alpine festivals, however, are the kermesses, some of which take place during the summer, when the chief features are matches (wrestling, throwing, etc.), followed by a dance, others are celebrated in the fall, after the return to the village, and then the festivities are on a larger scale, and include theatricals, flag swinging, and more dancing, often assisted by wild-men masks, called "Tschammeler" (See illustration on page 1113)

Agricultural customs are most in evidence at harvest There we find the "lucky handful." a bunch of ears of

These "might-boys," whose that occupation is roaming about at hight, annoying "Kilters," and getting into all manner of mischief, are a degenerate form of the bachelors' societies whose development is a feature of Swiss village life. These are known all over Switzerland, and are more or less highly organized. They play an important part in all village festivals, and exercise minute supervision over the life of the inhabitants. They are strict judges of maimers, and especially morals, in former days the members were subjected to the severest discipline, and any offence against religion or morality was numercifully punished. In Kusnacht on Rigi the" might boys' keep up the old custom of meeting under the window of cyll docis, and discussing the list of their misdeeds in a long dialogue. Less serious forms of this sort of thing are the hanging of a little fir tree to the door-bell of a hen pecked husband, putting up a wisp of straw or a dry pine tree top for a faithless girl, posting up a bill near her house catalogumiz ber sins, scattering chaff, etc

Switzerland is rich in festivals connected with particular crafts and callings. We will begin with the Alpine herdsmen Exervone knows the festive procession up to the pasture, led by the herdsman in his Sunday best, and the master cow, often the winner in last year's cow fight, carrying the milking stool between her horns, the other cows and the hands follow in due order. The finest cows often wear wreaths. as celebrated a usage is that of the "prayer-call" which the herdsmen of certain pastures intone through a milk-funnel at nightfall, so that the deep, monotonous sounds ring out far and wide. Some of these prayers are

AN FASIFR CUSION

Amongst customs connected with the Laster egg the symbol of hidden germination, is a curious form of contest. A wager is laid between the representatives of two sides, while one of them is ruinning to a given place and back the other has to pick up a certain number of eygs, sometimes two or three hundred, laid in a long row on the ground, and place them in a tub corn left standing till the very end, and then cut down in the name of the Trinity. These cars will keep away bad luck from the house. The sower throws the first three grains in the air, and the harvester tosses the first three ears into the field, to propriate the "corn mother", and the first two handfuls of stalks are tied crosswise and laid aside.

As soon as craftsmen unite to form guids and corporations, their festivals become more elaborate. One of the most famous, especially since the great celebration in 1905, is that of the vintuers, the "Fête des Vignerons," at Vevey. It consisted originally of a simple procession of the vintuers with their emblems, just like the parades of dozens of other guilds, and such as we may see to day in Neuchatel at vintage time. But as time went on, the procession grew more and more claborate, more figures, gaver colours, dramatic features were added, until the whole assumed greantic proportions. This necessitated longer intervals between the festivals, in the nineteenth century there were but six celebration.

We cannot mention more than a few of the many old and significant calendar customs. To begin with those of the winter months. St. Nicholas (December 6th) 1, not so much a kindly bishop as a terrifying demon, true, he brings presents to good claldeen, but the thicatens to carry the naughty ones off to the woods in his sack. Sometimes whose hocks of. Clauses "appear together (see illustration on page 1114). In many places this demon goes about during the "Twelve Nights." (December 25th to January 6th), a season held sacred from remote antiquity According to popular belief, armies of wild, incanny creatures, often led by some one maleficent demon, are loose at this time, in Tessin, houses are then funigated to drive out witches and devils, and in Emmental, on New Year's Eve, a piece of bread and a kinde are laid on the table as a sacrifice to the house-spirits. A midevolent demon is the "Straggele," which goes about, customary way, going about with noisy instruments. In Zirrich, this custom obtains two nights before Christinas or on December 30th, and frightful figures, "Schnabel Geissen" (lit. beak-goats), are led about. (See illustration on page 1118.)

Parades with different kinds of noisy instruments, as rattles, etc., in winter and spring, are a feature of folk-usage found all over the world. The object usually is to frighten away balcful demons by incars of the deafening, invariably tacket often reinforced by the cracking of chorimous whips

A biref notice will suffice for the actual Christmas customs. In Switzerland, as elsewhere we find the Christmas songs, the tree the presents the Yule-log, and a host of spells, charms and superstitions as to the magic quality of this holy day.

New Year's Eve and New Year's Day, too, are rich in old world customs most of them meant to ensure abundance during the coming year. In Eastern Switzerland, especially in Zurich, the 2nd of January is kept as a holiday, with all sorts of jollification. On twelfth Night, January 6th, the Three Kings go about with the Star, asking for gifts. Then mittals, C. M. B., are written over doorways for protection against exil powers.

Manifold are the usages connected with Shrovetide, an inextircable mixture of eld pagan and Roman springtime customs, Christian religious rites, and secular folk-uses, medieval and modern

Shrovetide theatricals were more in vogue formerly than they are now. An elaborate example is to be seen in the Muotta Valley, acted in the open air. The theme of the play, as in the old moralities, is the contest between worldliness and godliness. The Swiss name of this performance seems to point to a close relationship with another custom, which, to a certain extent assumed the form of a play, and which satirized old maids and bachelois.

The old rites for the promotion of fertility play an important part in these days of spring. Now, as at New Year's time, noisy processions appear. Special mention is due to the "Chalanda Mais" often accompanied by a grant, steals away disobedient children, and tears them in the air, punishes idle spinners, and revenges herself signally on the lads who make fini of her in the

A PALM SUNDAY CUSTOM

The "Palm" is in this instance a fir tree decorated with ribbons, fruit, eggs and scapularies (Canton of Arpovic) (Match 1st), in ecutam regions of Grisons, which consists not only in a ringing out of the winter (" to make the grass grow"), but also in a battle (originally ritual), between the boys of two neighbouring villages—" Ringing out the old and ringing in the new," with all sorts of noise and ceremony, sometimes called " carrying out death," assumes various shapes at Shroyetide.

In the Grisons Oberland we find a remarkable custom, traceable among other nations as well. On Invocavit Sunday, the adults betook themselves to the nm, and there, and copions libations,

Of the practices connected with May-day, or the days immediately following, we must mention the pretty custom of "May-singing" on the first Sunday of the month, either, as in Berne, two girls go about with a green be-ribboned bush, and sing the advent of May at the doors of the farmhouses, their song usually ending in a request for a gift (generally edible), or whole bevies of children go about, or there are regular processions led by a bride and groom. Pronument in all the Maytime usages are the fresh green leaves and flowers of the season. On May 1st, fountains are garlanded, and may-trees put up in front of the houses of newly elected magistrates. Still more deeply rooted in the life of the people is the compliment the lover pays his lass in planting the may for her. "A green tree for the one you love, a straw man or a 'Natienast'," (life fool's branch, "for the one you hate," such is the rule of the village. Sometimes as in parts of St. Gall, a catalogue of the misdeeds of the ostracized one is placed in the straw man's hand.

A remarkable Whitsuntide custom, reminiscent of pagan rites, is the parade of the Whitsun demon, found both in French and German Switzerland. In the Frick Valley, for example, the boys go to the woods, dress up one of their number in green branches, mount him on a horse, and lead him through the village. At the fountain the rider is dipped, whereupon he has the right to sprinkle the bystanders, especially the girls, it is considered lucky to be thus sprinkled.

The most important day of the simmer is St. John's Day, June 24th. Certain herbs only acquire virtue from being gathered on that date, in Valais, a brinch of nine different plants is then picked and fastened to the house to protect it. A bath on the night of St. John's Day has curative properties (Zug), whereas in other places it is said to be dangerous, as St. John's night claims a victim." On this day three persons must perish, one in the air, one by fire, and one in the water. Bonfires on the hills are restricted to French Switzerland.

As the autumn days lack significant festivals and customs, this ends our survey of the year. This rough sketch may suffice to give some idea of the wealth of old-world custom and living tradition to be found by the student of folk lore in the little Alpine republic.

A CURIOUS COSTUME CHAMPERY

The women of this district have for a long time worn a dress which combines elegance with the freedom of movement necessary in their calling. The scarlet kerchief, with its ends hanging over the shoulders, makes a very striking head dress.

CHAPTER LI 8CANDINAVIA By CHARLES RUDY

It was a German philosopher, Nictzsche, I believe who first diew attention to the hery "joy of life" of the southern European, and contrasted it with the pessimism of the north with its lone winter nights and short suminy hours, with its shadows that seem to stretch forever into the intense darkness.

It is not surprising that the inhabitants of Scandinavia should, under the influence of their surroundings dread the Unknown, and people the shadows with guoines and spirits of a malevolent nature. The inischievous little-prites of om spirit world that are really sympathetic creatures have no place in the sagas and folk-fore of Scandinavia, where all is gloomy and trage.

Denmark, an integral part of the European Continent, and linked to Germany icross Schleswig Holstein, is less affected by the shadows of the north than are the other Scandinayian countries, and we find a striking resemblance between Tentons and Danes as regards local customs. The exclusive veneration of the stock is common to both, though even more accentrated in Denmark than in Germany, in the former country the awkward, long legged bird is to be seen following the peasant who is birsy ploughing his field.

In rural Denmark the customs and costumes of the past are dying out rapidly, and most of those that still exist have degenerated beyond salvation. Christmas is the great feast of the year, and is celebrated in a manner similar to that obtaining in Germany. There is one curious addition, however, that we find here and there throughout Scandmayia, and that is the lighting of the Yule candles, two of which are lit on Christmas. Eve and are allowed to birin throughout the might. They represent the master and mistress of the house, and if, for any reason, they should go out before morning, it is a certain sign of death. Clothes and food are placed where the light from the candles can fall on them, and thus will they be blessed during the forthcoming year. Birth, marriage and death are the occasion for feasting. The funeral rites generally take place one week after death has occurred, and are the occasion for quite exceptional wakes, of which food forms an essential item.

The harvest least, Hoerst Cilde, is, together with Christinas and the Great Prayer Day (the fourth Friday after Easter), the most national of Denmark's festivals. The last sheaf, commonly called Gamle (old woman), is gaily decorated with flowers and biniting and taken in a procession around the tarmer's estate to the kitchen where the good dame presides over her shining pots and pans On arrival here, the labourers sharpen their sexthes, a sign that unless a good feast is forthcoming they will immediately proceed to the kitchen-garden and cut offall the housewife's cabbages—a threat which has, however, never to be carried out. The first sheaf of the season, on the other hand, is world position—the mistress of the house does not sit down to meals with her husband's guests, but waits at table; but she is respected, and where that happens, morals are never lax—Her festive dress is equally out of date—she wears a high, helmet shaped hat, covered with white mislin, which talls like a bridal veil (see illustration on page 1127)—A clasp or jewelled brooch, sometimes in the shape of a corone), crowns her forchead, while across her war t a broad belt terminates in another clasp, of more massive but not of less artistic ment—In ordinary attire, the feelandic woman wears a hula or black cap (in the case of guls the colour is generally light blue), with a tassel, which is caught up on the cap by a silver clasp.

What the slars to the Norwegian, the pony is to the native of Iceland. It is used for every mortal purpose connected with transport for the carrying of has, lumber, riders, and even such heavy spects as pianos, etc., which are slung between two, iour, or more poines, as the case may be. As riders, the inhabitants of Iceland, both men and women, boys and guls, are without a rival. Bareback, or in their saddles, they ride whenever they have to go even the shortest distance, simply catching hold of a pony and jumping on it. The women's side-saddles, more particularly those used by old dames, and they ride until they are well over seventy, are quaint. They are cushioned and decorated with brass nails, have a broad foot-rest and a rail on the off side.

The condies are avain lighted early on Christians morning before divine service and placed in the windows old Scandinavia, is the custom for all guests at a table to shake the host's hand immediately after concluding the meal. Hospitality is as general and as freely given as in Sweden, Norway and Denmark

There are certain customs and superstitions that are to a very large extent common to all Scandinavian countries. A weak-minded or crippled child is supposed to be a child of the underworld, the real intant having been exchanged for it at the critical moment. To guard against this danger, a piece of steel is placed in the cradle of a new born babe, and a live ember into his first bath. If a dying person expresses the wish to die, a friend or relative climbs up on the roof of the house, and calls out in a loud voice. "Come up!"—thereby calling the evil spirit which is supposed to prevent the sufferer from departing this life in peace.

TINLAND. By Dr. K. F. KARJALAINEN

Fin inhabitants of Finland have not the sole claim to be called Finns, the name being used collectively for the Finnish, or Ugro Finnie race, which is scattered throughout Finland. Lapland, the Baltie provinces, and parts of Russia, West Siberia and Hungary. Even in the Grand Duchy of Finland, which is governed, subject to its own constitution, by the Emperor of Russia, the customs vary considerably, and in the short space allowed it is proposed to describe those of the Karehans of Viena, and only those that are most typical of the people. This branch of the Karehans, situated as it is

The customs here described were observed by the writer during an expedition in dertaken in 1894 with $M_{\rm F}/L/K$. Inha, to whom he is indebted for part of these note-

The Karehans are extremely fond of society, not only bying in large villages, where it is more difficult to obtain a hychhood than in the forest clad hills where game is found, but travelling great distances to visit then neighbours. Every village has its own festival day, when strangers are expected, and every Karehan man and woman who arrives on such occasions is freely cutertained Games and dances are held at these meetings, which are, so to speak, "marriage markets," and these festivities are, perhaps, more important than the good cheer that is provided. Very often an acquaintanceship thus formed ends in courtship and a happy marriage.

There is now much bustle in the bride's home, the relations are called together, and begin to discuss the question behind locked doors. The parents have the cliner say in the matter, and, after them, the gull's godfather. If the kinsmen agree and the gull leaves, then she beinds her knee to the kinsmen, beginning with her father, and says. "You knew to nomish me, so you know also to give me away." The father lights a candle before the cottage ikon, and orders his daughter to extinguish it or left it burn. (see allustration on this page). If the gull does not extinguish, the candle, he agrees to her going, and so the union for ever is complete, which the incirest male relations of the bride and bridgeroom confirm by shaking hands and making money ring in front of the sacred picture. She is then betrothed

The bride sits in the women's corner, and on both sides are weepers. From the other side of the cottage the mother comes with weepers. Both groups meet on the floor, and then go to the women's corner, where the betrothal song r wept. (See illustration on page 1128.)

The myrting and giving of wedding-presents takes place to the accompaniment of weeping, one or two ilettajas, i c, professional weepers, assisting the girl. For everybody they have to weep two songs, one of request and one of thanks, and certainly there is need of a throat and a back too, because in weeping the thanks, the passibo, you must from time to time bend your head to the ground before the giver of the presents. From the house of a rich relative a present is given for every person, all kinds of clothes silk headgear shirts, towels etc.

When the wedding is to take place the bridegroom comes in the morning with some one of his kinsfolk to the bride's home, and sits in the faithest-away orner. The bridegroom with his follower steps in front of the bride, bows his head and tells her that he has come to seek her for the wedding. Having said so, they go away. The bride rises up.

On the part of the bridegroom, the "wedding-father" with the "wedding-mother" holds with a fauldkerchief an ikon over the couple, after which all the "wedding-people," altogether about ten persons, bench down on the floor before the ikons, beseeching them to bless the journey.

The bridegroom's men go out first, the bride makes a deep bow to all present in the cottage, requesting them to bless the journey. Before leaving, the patraska (master of ceremones) in the tshunala performs rites in order to protect the couple from netations magic, but he himself, as representing the old superstitions beliefs, does not go to the Christian wedding ceremony. In the churchyard, the bridegroom gives to the bride the head-cloth by which he conveys the bride into the church. All the "wedding-people" come into the church it is ordense a crowd that no one could succeed in passing through them. In the church the couple and the "wedding-father and "wedding mother" are standing on a calco mat. On the return journey the bridegroom invites the bride into his house, and all the "wedding people" if they are hying in the same village. If the bridegroom is from a distant village he has in the village where the wedding takes place some house belowing to a relative or acquaintance as temporary home. The wedding festivities begin on Saturday night. The girls warm the bath house and, weeping, invite the bride into the bath house and, weeping song expressed in old flowery language, is wept. (See illustration on page 1144).

After the bath, the first presents are brought to her—the bridegroom himself in the cottage offers them on a large plate. After long exenses, the bride touches them with her hand, and then her father or another near relation receives them—the bride's counter-presents are placed on the same plate. The saajannanen,* i.e., the bride's follower and helper, fixes what is to be given to each one—the pateaska or the saajannanen receives the presents intended for the bridegroom's people and relations—On this occasion also floods of tears are wept.

gaines are in full swing. The bride, with the WCCDCIS. goes found among the people asking for present. If somebody looks out for a person from whom it is advantageous to make a request he is embraced by the neck, and so there is weeping until the present is given, after which thanks are wept. After some time has clapsed, the firing of rifles is heard in the courtvard, and the bridegroom's people come in order to be present at the katshotus, i.e., the bride's first ceremonial appearance to the bridgeroom's people

The long family table⁴ is still in front of the middle window, but the paleaska brings in other tables and places them along the room, puts the table-linen on the tables, throws salt under the linen, takes the loaf of bread brought from the bridegroom's house, another loaf from the bride's house, cuts a round piece from the centre of both loaves, puts salt into the hole thus made, and then sets the pieces into their places. The loaves are placed on the family table, a little nearer the lower end. The bridegroom's followers sit at the side of the wall, the bride's kinspeople are gathered at the ends of the tables, and at the other sides of the tables as many as are possible—twenty persons and more. The bride's weepers weep in the Ishimaia until the godfather or brother leaves to make her ready. Over the ordinary weekday clothes are put the best clothes which the weepers ask for with words of weeping. The godfather or brother offers the chemise, which he holds over the bride's head,

The same ceremony is performed with the petticoat and the skirt. On the other hand, the bride heiself puts on her apion and head band. There is only one head-band and one pair of boots and stockings, but all other articles of clothing are two, beginning with the chemise above-mentioned.

The bride is then brought into the pirth and goes to the women's corner. Mong with her come five kassamichet i e, the bride's kinswomen, who undo the bride's plant of hair, the godmother first, then aimts and distant elder relations (see illustration on page 1132). When they are come to the corner, the midwife draws a curtain. The palvaska gives the midwife ten copecks, after which she

The bride's followers then place themselves along the side of the wall, the bridegroom at the centre of the table and the bride's male relations at the opposite side. The bride is then given a large plate on which there are two glasses. One of the bride's kinsmen poins aqua citae into them, or some other strong spirit, and the bride begins to ofter it, first to the bridegroom, exhorting him in Russian probably all she knows of the language to empty the glass. The bridegroom, however, must not take it. The bride then offers it to the godfather, to her own kinsfolk, and bridesmads, and all of these drink. The bridegroom has also brought a bottle, and now aqua citae from both these bottles is poured into both goblets, which the bridegroom and bride then take. They knock

The goblets must be put back on the table quite close or each other otherwise strife and discord will come between them. Then the people rise from the table, only the bride-groom's followers remain. The latter put on the table much money and the patenskii calls upon the bride's people to come and take the "head money." The bride's kinsfolk take all, although there may be thousands of pieces on the table. The bridegroom's followers dispute with them and desne to have the money back. After they have quarrelled for some time and the bride's people have given back half, the people of the house are content with from three te five roubles and lifteen copecks for the small village chapel. The bridegroom's followers then express then thanks that so little has been taken.

THE BRIDE BOWS TO HER MOTHER IN. LAW

On arriving at the husband is house the wire has between her thumb and first finger a piece of copper moner, which the creemonies takes and thrivis away as a symbol of purchasing land for her. Where she has entered the house, her mother inclaim meets her with bread, and leads her in, whereupon the bride kneels and bows to her

After the people have drunk—they have been twice offered from both bottles—then the division of the presents again begins

On the part of the bridegroom there is put on a large plate the katshotuskosto, i.e., the cloth for a skirt presented to the bride by the bridegroom on the occasion of her first ceremonial appearance to the bridegroom's followers. All the latter rise up and it is ceremonially offered to the bride, mentioning all the names, each one making a bow. This is done twice, but the third time the bride touches the large plate with her hand and the same man who poured out the aqua vita receives the cloth for the skirt for her. The katshotuskosto is silken if the bridegroom's means permit of this, and not yet sewn. In as ceremon has a manner the bride spresents are offered to the bridegroom. The bridegroom always receives a red shirt. In accepting it he shakes it thire, and modeler times he drew it under his right leg. All the presents for the bridegroom's followers the patvaska divides with his whip, to which a magic bag is attached.

It is canons that in the farewell weepings there is not anything which expresses thanks to the parents of the bride's deep sorrow at leaving her home. The farewell weeping-song are entirely material. The bride in them asks first her parents' blessing and then begins to request all sorts of household goods as a dowry. Something quite different was the mother's weeping-song in reply which I heard. While listening to that weeping-song of the mother many an eye appeared wet for so bitterly did she lament, holding her daughter to her boson, the separation from her darling who had been dearer to her than her own lib.

THE WEFFING RUNO OF THE MOTHER

The week following the courtship the bride must work presents for her relatives, visit her kinswomen and if she is withcut means borrow gifts for use at the welding ceremonies

When the bride has taken leave of her relatives and put away the head-band, the mark of girlhood, a chest, which must be full of articles, is brought it to the prth, into the women's corner. The bride, dressed in her best clothes, is made to sit on it after one of her relatives has conducted her three times round the chest. In every round she sits on the chest, and after the third round she remains on it. I woold women now take her and begin to comb her hair and put it into two plants tribs hair, again, is in two plants which are brought round the crown. The paleaska then gives the necessary coverings for the head cloth and hulupaikka, a large cloth with which the bride's head and nick are covered, so that she does not see anything nor anyone see into her eyes. Gloves are then put into her hands. When the hulupaikka is put on the bride's head, then only a small handsome boy, sitting at the bride's teet, is allowed to look under it. By placing a small boy there, it is intended to remind the bride of her future calling as a mother and exhort her to be good to children

In preparing the bride, two or three old women sing the song of putting the headgear on the head. When are sing the following words: "Away, boys, out, heroes, go out even the tallest men," the limsband's party must leave the pirth. One of the bride's home-people comes and shuts the door and does not let them out unless on payment of money. The husband's party endeavour to pay in copper, but no notice is taken of the copper, it must be silver or gold. The husband's party then give a small silver piece, and so pass out.

When the husband's party leaves the pirth, one of them has on his head two loaves of bread, known as the "loaves of handshaking," the one from the bride, the other from the bridegroom.

bread is put into a cloth, which is bound crosswise with a yellow band. Between the loaves is salf. The husband's party go to the courtyard and line up there, awaiting the bride, whom the godfather will subsequently bring out. The latter takes from the bride's chest a cloth, leading her with the cloth or a handkerchiel round a table to the centre of the floor. The girls hasten to kick the chest in order to receive love, and running after the bride, they knock the corners of the table which the bride has done for the same purpose. The sign of the cross is made and the daughter leaves for the last time her father's home, leaving her dear mother, to begin and try a new life with her husband.

The wife, who still has the humipurkka over her eyes, is brought before the husband and makes three deep bows to him. The giver makes a short speech, in which he gives advice both to the husband

If she still does not obey, strike her with a harder weapon, even with a cowl-staff. But gnard against losing life, because we have a large kinship which is ready to take upon itself the duty or blood revenge."

When both the husband and the wife have been given good advice, the husband walks thrice round the wife and looks under the hudupakka to see whether the woman there is really his wife.

After certain magic ceremonies they leave for the husband's home, to which the bride's relations are again invited. For a long time after her arrival, the wife must bow with open eyes. While this is going on, the "song of coming" is sung.

The Krykla some recembles to some extens the game of enterprise a shirt stick being thrown at a row of celedrical pieces of word alloid talkas which are arranged in front of a square. The summer the sum from alternative ends of the field, but instead of standard, they sit assude of the ficers who are called standard the back." Should all the summer mass the pins the some commences again.

With this the ordinary wedding ceremonies finish. Afterwards the celebration of the first night takes place and the pateuska must carefully see that nothing illegal occurs. For this purpose he himself follows the young couple into their bedroom, and here the wife must wait upon her husband for the first time. The first night the wife sleeps fully dressed.

Such are the troubles and worries the young girl has to go through before she can begin her life together with her husband. These wedding customs have taken such deep root among the people that, although the priest may have wedded the couple before, the bride is not allowed to be considered married until the Karchan wedding ceremonies have been observed. On the other hand, many postpone the ecclesia stical wedding to a suitable occasion, often for months, even xyear or more, so that they may have their children baptized at the same time

All, however, do not continue to wait a whole week, and all do not have means for observing the wedding ceremonies, although not much money is spent in them. They may avail themselves of a custom which may be a survival of capturing wives. The would-be bridegroom goes in front of the woman whom he fancies, bows and offers her a corner of a woman's head-cloth. It she does not take it the third time, it is a sign that she does not like the man. It she takes it and thereby shows her consent, no other ceremonies are required than that some old woman does the gul's han up into two plants, presses a hat on to her head, and the bride, the young wife, is thereby ready

The young wife's life is now in her new home, but only for the first week is it somewhat easier. She is not ordered any hard work, because she is supposed to spend this week in becoming acquainted with the work of the house and making visits in the village. That time corresponds to what we

LAPLAND, By F. HEDGES BUTLER, F.R.G.S.

The area commonly known by the name of Lapland lies above the Arcue Cucle, partly in Russia, partly in Sweden and partly in Norway.—The inhabitants, who are probably of Mongoloid origin, have from very early aroused curiosity of travellers from their dissimi-Januty to other European races. The name "Tapp" may have been originally a term of contempt, meaning 'outlandish. there is considerable doubt about its de rivation, and any such significance would be entirely unwarranted at the pre-ent time

The Lapps, who may be divided into mount un sca, Torest and river Lapps, are of extremely small stature, the men being very raidy above five feet in height, with legs somewhat short in proportion to their bodies, a low, broad nose and a complexion which, whatever its natural colour. swarthy owing to their habits of life and the severity of the climate and the young men, dressed in then best for the Easter Celebrations, present a dignified appearance. They lead an extremely simple life, being, for the most part, hunters and, fishermen. In the winter they live on the outskirts of the great forests and look after their reindeer. When summer comes, they leave their coincal huts and go to the mountains, following the reindeer, which they let go free. On their return they catch one of the herd and hang a bell round his neck, thus attracting the rest, which they drive together with the assistance of their dogs. The superfluous stags are then killed and the meat smoked in preparation for the writer months. That Certain of their customs are ample testimony of their simplicity. M. Regnard, who visited the country in 1681, describes one which we shall relate in his own words, as it exists to day and has been observed by the writer. "Their baths are made of wood, like all their houses. One observes in the middle of this bath, a great mass of stones thrown together without order, except that they have a hole in the middle, in which the fire is lighted.

"These stones, being once heated, communicate warmth to the whole place—but this heat augments to a great degree, when they proceed to throw water upon the flint stones, which, emitting a stifling smoke, cause the air which is breathed in these places to be warm as fire

"But what surprised us most in entering this bath was finding boys and girls, mothers and sons, brethren and sisters all promiscuously together. But we were still more surprised at beholding young girls with a switch, striking the naked men and boys. I first supposed that Nature being exhausted by great sweat, required this assistance for the purpose of showing that there still remained some signs of life in the bather, but I was soon undeceived, and learned that the practice was followed in order that the frequent strokes should open the pores and assist in

I afterwards, with difficulty, conceived how these people, issuing naked from their fiery baths, could run and throw themselves into an extremely cold layer which was within a few paces of the house, and I supposed that they must have very strong constitutions before they could remain unaffected with those consequences which such a sudden transition from heat to cold was naturally calculated to produce."

The Lapps travel in sleighs or on skts (see illustration on page 1142), and they carry spade 89cks with which to dig beneath the snow for the moss on which the reindeer feed, and for assistance in skiing down steep slopes.

Driving the reindeer, one must be careful not to lose the rein which is twisted round the wrist. If the reindeer gets away it is extremely difficult to catch. Pulka driving is very casy and one soon

Reindeer follow each other and make an "S" line, very seldom going straight. They will travel all day, resting at intervals for food, which they dig for with their feet till they get through the snow to the moss. Often you cannot see their heads, which are buried in the deep snow, only their hind-quarters being visible.

Christianity is the religion of the country, the Lapps in Russia belonging to the Greek church and those in Sweden to the Lutheran Church. The Lapp dogs are admitted into the clinich and a dozen or more may be running about during the service or sleeping quietly next their owners. Sometimes they start fighting together, or follow their masters up to the altar. The dog, of course, plays

The skin was divided into compartments for the celestral and terrestrial gods and for man. The later designs showed Christ and the Virgin as well as the sin and Thor. On the drumblead was placed a divining-rod and the future was fold from its position when the drum was beaten.

At Easter and in Decend , the great Church Festivals are held and most of the confirmations and weddings are held at the former. Often three or four couples are married at the same time, the Lapp dogs following them to the altar. The bride and bridegroom are usually diesed in red, with red silk scarves, white shoes, für gaiters and red gloves.

The binials too, generally take place at Easter when the ground is thawed. The coffins remain throughout the winter in a small tower near the church (see illustration on this page). RUSSIA, By CLIVE HOLLAND

Rt ssrv is to many a my-terions and even terrible land. The co-mineling of the East with the West is seen there in all matters of life, custom and tradition. Only those who recognize this fact can ever hope to understand the apparent anachronisms in Russian life and character or to scratch deeper than the surface of Russian listory and tradition. In no set of Russian customs is this impunging of the more conventional ideas of the West upon the layer and more primitive ideas of the East more clearly marked than in those relating to marriage. The old order and the new dwell side by side in Russia to-day, and at present have in reality imagled very little, and often are inducedly related the one to the other. A wedding, according to the Greek church to which Russia belongs, is instinct with beauty and invisic meaning.

If a Russian girl reaches the age of twenty without having married, he usually feels herself, and even is considered by her friends, to be disgraced. To be called an old mark in Russia is, by many girls, considered a great affront. As is the case in Turkey, there are few old maids in Russia, and every woman there either marries or pretends that she is married.

The details of marriages are usually arranged through some priest or through a seacha or a matrimonial agent. The latter always knows all the business of the eligible partis, their families, the amount of money that the man or girl has, and the particular requirements of those who wish to marry. The seacha also performs the duties of a kind of astrologer, predicting what is genig to happen to the would-be bride and bridegroom, telling them their linky days, and usually selecting one of the latter on which the wedding is to take place.

Although professing to be an astrologer, she does not, however, consult the stars, but tells the fortune, etc., of the future bride by means of a pack of cards. So highly is her advice esteemed that many who are not of the lower order would not divant of marrying without consulting the seacha.

Stories are told of swachas who have not been consulted acting the part of the wicked gnomes of tany fiction and bringing all sorts of misfortime on the people who have slighted them. Every Russian bride is supposed to have a downy, and the priests or "popes," and not notatics, are generally employed in country districts in drawing up a marriage settlement. I laborate tronsseaux are the fashion in Russia, and even peasant girls have much more expensive wed ling outfits and much more beautiful bothing than then Fighsh sisters of a like position. The marriage function is always a costly matter so people in the world are more naturally gene ous and perhaps inclined to be spendthrifts than the Russians. The bride usually presents the statue of the Vingin, belonging to the church in which she is married or which she attends, with beautiful robes of silver brocade, and in Southern Russia she also gives her pope a pair of snow white doves. This, it may be noted, is a survival of the old pagan worship of Venus.

The betrothal feast is an important event in Russia, and puts the finishing touch to the wood. At it the bride electicuts off and cives to Lei fiancé a long tress of her own han. His gift takes a more imaterial and less poetic form, and consists of bread and salt and almond cake, and a silver ring set with a turquoise. By this ceremony he is held, as it were, to be endowing his bride with the necessaries of life, as well as pledging his troth to her with the ring. The couple are now solemnly pledged to marry, and it would be a great trouble and disgrace should the troth be broken. The betrothal ring is treasured more than anything else by the bride and her family. It is kept as an heriloom, and no thief would ever think of stealing it, even if he had an opportunity, but the ring must not be used more than for one betrothal. These rings are always bought from the clergy, who bless them and derive a considerable amount from their sale. The betrothal ceremony takes place a week and a day before the actual marriage, and the bride is compelled by custom during these following eight days to spend most of her time weeping and wailing and lamenting the approach of the time when she will leave her parents' roof. The bride's girl friends usually devote themselves to comforting and cheering her during these eight days prior to marriage.

On the day before the wedding the bride niplaits her long tail of hair which is the universal badge of the immarried gul, and gives to her gul friends the flowers and ribbons with which the loosened tresses were decorated. Then her companions take her in hand (as is the case also with Arab brides, Indian and many others), lead her to the bath, and spend many hours in diessing her and re-doing her long hair, all the while singing songs to her of love and happiness. When the wedding-day arrives, it is the custom for the bridegroom to come to the bride's house and claim her. Then there lollows a very beautiful little ceremony. The bride-to-be kneeds before her parents and craves of them pardon for any and every offence of act of disobedience towards them of which she may have been at any time guilty. They ruse her to her feet, kiss her, offer her bread and salt, which is symbolical that so long as life lasts they will not see her want the necessaries of life, and when she steps forth from the old home to go to her new, the door is left open, to signify that she may return when she will

BRIDE CHOOSING ON CHRISTMAS EVE

On Christman Eve, in certain villages in Russin, it is the custom for maningeable girls to assemble in the house of the head man. Then the mistress of the house veils each of them. Young men wishing to wed wait outside while this is being done, and are then brought in one after the other, each to bow before one of the veiled figures, whereupon the mistress lifts the covering and the pair become engaged. It is more than probable that in all cases the man is well aware of the identity of the girl be chooses in this manner.

to claim his sister, the brother will stand in the way with a staff or drawn sword so as to prevent the bridegroom's approach. This is, of course, a purely formal exhibition of his guardianship of his sister, as, unless the marriage met with the approval of the family, the betrothal would not have taken place. Sometimes the brother will not allow the bridegroom to pass infless he pays a considerable sum which the bride has niged him to extract from the bridegroom as a price for herself, her yell and her beauty. The marriage ceremony itself is a long and very picture-que one. Towards its close it is the custom to drink wine and water, in commenoration of the wedding at Cana in Galilee. Then the bride and bridegroom follow the priest three times round the altar and kiss each other three times, and also the ikons.

Among the most interesting and curious sights in Russia are the marriage tails, which are held in Easter week in the more remote districts. Formerly they were also held in the large towns. It is the custom on these occasions for all the marriageable grils and young men in search of wives to resort to the public square of the village or town, or park, if there be one, and there and then engage upon the important enterprise of choosing their partners for life. The rich men of the district naturally have then choice first, and when a gril's face or figure or other qualities please one of these, it is the custom for limit to ask her the names and address of her parents. If the errl likes the appear ance of the would-be suitor, she gives the required information. If she refuses to do so, it is understood that she declines the implied offer of marriage. Year by year the custom is being dropped more and more by the better class of grils, and, save in the very remote districts, to day is chiefly patronized by servants and peasant-grils.

There are many superstitions current in Riesia, and one of these is the universal belief in the existence of the damovor, an elf-like spirit which is supposed to inhabit every house in common with the owner, and render it agreeable or otherwise for the inhabitants. The damovor is always believed to be dressed in black or yellow, and to have a long grey beard, light flaxen hair, and red, shining

One of the most important customs in connection with general religious observances is that of the "Holy Chrism". This follows the rite of baptism. It is the custom or ceremony of anomiting. The "Chrism" is prepared with great solemnity by the highest chirch dignitaries in Moscow every three or five years, and is afterwards distributed for use by the priests throughout the Russian Empire.—The holy outment can only be made during fort. In many parts of the country districts there still prevails the practice of blessing the houses, barns, byres and meadows because of the sprites, evil sprits and inalignant fairies who have escaped from beneath the ice on the break-up of the winter. The village priest has to visit every house, and is given a few copecks for his blessing by each of his parishioners. His services are also required at seedtime and harvest. PLASANT COSTUME, RUSSIA

The peasant costumes of Russia are very varied, and many are really brautiful. Bright colours such as red, orange and blue, with white and black, frequently enter into the colour scheme. Although Russia is not quite a land of flowers, the latter are much used for the decoration of the head-dresses worn.

A woman who expects a baby has to observe a great number of traces both before and after the birth of the child. She must not look at ugly things or beings, as the child is then in danger of resembling them. When the moment of birth has come, great care is taken to conceal the fact from the neighbours, otherwise the confinement will be a very painful one, due to the harmful influence of ill-wishers or to the "cycleve". Many of the practices which are observed on such occasious, and which we describe here, have a definite object in view, namely, to ward off the harmful influences of the cycleve, and to propitate the Fates, when they visit the child.

For these reasons we treat them here together. noting at the same time the differences of customs which occur amongst them nnist also note that the existmg political boundaries do not correspond with the ethnological divisions, and that the admixture of nations in some parts, as, for instance, in Macedonia i very great. Amongst the Rumanians, immediately after the child is born it is washed in hot water, and a small spot of white ashes is made on its forehead in order to protect it from the evil eve. If a goose has been previously bathed in that water, this will maine the child against witchery. After the bath the water is never thrown away carciessly, but it is poured carefully on some clean spot, never beyond the house's shade, lest it should be spilt on the Fates, who would then get very angry with the child

Amongst the Greeks and the Macedonians, the child is bathed in linkewarm wine with myrtheleaves, after which it is generally covered with a layer of salt. When the salt is washed off the relatives and friends throw into the bath money, which becomes the property of the undwife. It is also customary in these regions to hang a clove of garbe and a gold ring or a gold com on the mother's hair, as well is on the new born baby, as a protection against the evil eye. Amongst the numerous degrees employed is protection from the evil eye, garber the commonest and the most widely used

The relationship established between the child and his sponsor is such a strong one that intermatriage between the godehild's and the godeparent's families is prohibited. Marriage between a boy and a girl who have the same sponsor is also prohibited.

Amongst the Rumanians, the Pext morning's bathing, when the holy oils are washed off is considered just as important as the christening. In this bath are dropped a few cone and a piece of bread, in order to bring the child wealth and abundance, and also some sweet-basil, in order to make of the family have been disposed of, more especially when the difference in age between the brothers and sisters is not very great. Another general rule observed in this respect is that the daughters must marry in order of semiority, so that a vonliger sister cannot become enjaged as long as an elder one remains single.

It loyable. Marriages are usually arranged by the parents of the voning people with an eye to the material welfare of the contracting parties. That does not always mean that marriages of inclination do not occur, but even if the young people have fallen in love with each other, enston requires that the wedding business itself should be left in the hands of the parents. The negotiations between the families are usually carried our through a match-maker, through whom all the funancial arrangements are settled. For this reason one of the most auxion, cares of the parents is to provide their daughters with a suitable downy, to which in many cases brothers also contribute. For throughout all the classes of the population it is considered wrong for the sons to marry before all the daughters.

The asking in marriage is accomplished by numerous formalities, which vary according to peoples and localities. Thus, among the Servians and Bulgarians, the father of the young (iaan, accompanied by two friends or relatives, goes on the requesting errand. He brings with him a flat cake made of wheat and a bunch of flowers. One of his companions carries a rifle or a pistol, for it is the usual custom among these peoples to announce any joyful event by firing rifles or pistols. The party arrives at the house of the young girl about supper-time, and during supper one of the party explains in appropriate language the object of their visit. Thereupon the father puts on the table the cake he brought with him, on which he places the bunch of flowers and also some money. The girl's father these customs, as well as the characteristic part identical amongst all these peoples. We will first dose the customs prevailing amongst the Greeks and Rumamans, and afterwards those prevailing amongst the Servians and Bull garrans.

Marriages are usually celebrated on a Sunday. The wedding ceremones are beguir on the Thursday before the appointed Sunday, when the special wedding-cakes are prepared both in the bride's and bridegroom's house. The very grinding of the wheat, the kneading of the dough, and the baking, are done according to prescribed rules, anidst the singing of special songs, and with the accompaniment asks then leave to go and consult Les wife and daughter, but this is, of course, only a formality, as the thing had already been settled beforehand, when the other man has been encouraged to come and "ask" or "beg" for the daughter

A little while after the father returns, the gill is brought in by her brother or one of her male relatives. She bends deeply before him, kisses his hand, and from that moment is considered engaged to his son. After the girl has left the room the father in-law places a gold com on the calle. That com represents the princhase price he paid for his son's wife, and is called "the presentation to the house "

As we have already seen, the social life of the peasants inhabiting this corner of Europe abounds in symbolism and ceremony, and in no aspect of it is this more apparent than in the customs which prevail at marriage. Many of of the religious wedding ceremony, are almost

On his arrival the best man delivers a thymed speech to the bride, who is surrounded by the budesmaids, and has near her a pail of water and a big wedding cake. the end she playfully besprinkles the young men around her, and distributes the cake among those present. The bridegroom then goes home, and sends his bride the wedding These gifts always include the outfit which the bride will wear next day, including the jacket, the veil, the threads of gold, and the flowers. Dinner is taken at the brides house, and after dinner the down is taken to the bridgroom's, anndst much shouting, discharging of firearms, and the observance of many picturesque ecremonies, both when it is taken out of the house and when it arrives at the bridgeroom's home

A characteristic feature of the religious service is the so-called crowning (eremony). On enterme her new home, the bade sets her right toot upon a plough share purposely placed inside the door

We will describe now a few characteristic marriage customs of the Bulgarians and Servians. At these weddings there always are three special persons, who play a prominent part, namely the koom—the staeri—scal and the decer—The koom is the principal sponsor, and the most important personage at the welding. He is generally the son or the nearest relative of the main who was koom at the welding of the bridegroom's parents. Just as among the Greeks and Rumanians, it is he who will be the godfather to all the children from that marriage. The seal is the second witness, and is also the master of the ceremonies of the day, and presides at the wedding banquet. The decer is the bride leader and ber special guardian on that day, his function being to be constantly at her side.

After the wedding-guests have assembed at the bridegroom's house, where they are entertained to limich, they start for the bride's house, usually on horseback. The cavaleade is led by a man who carries a large wooden vessel filled with red wine, and his duty is to offer wine to every person the party meets on the way, and also to make jokes and to entertain the guests at the wedding festivities. In a carriage following him are the bridesmaids, selected amongst the relatives of the bridegroom, who carry the bride's wedding presents, including her wedding-dress, which has been bought by the bridegroom's father. Then follows the bridegroom, riding between the koom and the starri seat, and behind them come the long file of guests.

When the wedding-party arrives at the bride's house the men are conducted to the tables, which are loaded with eatables, while the bridesmaids proceed to diess the bride. When she is ready she is led by her brother or nearest male relation, to the koom and the starri seat to less their hands, and after this to the kitchen, where, in front of the hearth with burning fire her father and mother are scated. The bride prostrates herself before the hearth, and Lisses the earth or bricks in front of it Afterwards she bows deeply before her parents, kisses then hands, and receives their blessing

When, after the church ceremony, the wedding-party arrive, before the gate of the bridgeroom's house, the bude, descending from the carriage, steps first on a sack of oats, then on a plough, and lastly on the threshold of the gate. There a woman places into her arms a baby, which she lifts as high as she can, and, after kissing it, returns it to the woman. After this a loaf of bread is placed under her arms and a bottle of red winc into her hands, and thus loaded, she enters her new home it is easy to see that the symbolic meaning of the cutin ceremony is to confer wealth, prosperity, and happiness in her new life

The father and mother or the bridegroom receive her in the kitchen, sitting in front of the hearth, where burning wood and coal are spread. After she has kissed their hands, the mother-in law leads her three times round if c hearth, and places in her hand a shovel, with which she gathers toge her in one heap the scattered burning coal regions look forward to death without special fear, for "where there is life there is also death" and a man must go "when his days are out" are the principles of their homely philosophy on that point. Many of them will, therefore, prepare a long time beforehand the necessary things for their funeral, such as the boards for their coffin, the clothes in which they will be binned, the handkerchiefs which will be given away at the finicial, and even the tapers which are carried lighted on such occasions. It is also a usual thing for wealthy peasants to have stored away in their cellars a barrel of the national drink, which will be drunk." for their soul," by those attendire their funeral.

solemnity. Thus, amongst the Rumanians, the custom prevails never to allow a dying man to breathe his last "without a candle," that is, a lighted taper which is put into his hand at the last moment. If the man is not able to hold it by himself, then this must be done with the aid of a relative or of an intimate friend, who is thus doing the dying man a great service.

The Slavonic peoples have the custom to call to their death-bed all their relatives and friends, and ask forgiveness from every one of them. The answer is given in the following stereotyped form." May it be forgiven to thee in this world and in that other."

When a man has breathed his last the windows are opened in order that the soul may fly out. His eyes are closed by the nearest relative, usually the favorinte child. The female relations undo their hair, letting it hang loose over their back, and begin lamenting over the dead. We will give a few particulars about these lamentations a little later on. The body is washed in hot water, and, especially among the Rumamans, this water is not thrown away carelessly, but poured near a tree

A MONTENEGRIN EASTER CUSTOM

Among the Montenegrins the custom prevails at Easter of drinking to the Holy Trinity, and at the same time breaking eggs.

This is supposed to bring good luck and to wipe out misunderstandings. Fach of the persons drinking holds an egg in his hand, and the shells are broken by tapping each against the other and covered with the copper in which the water has boiled, for it is considered a sin to walk over this water

Amongst the Slavonic peoples, the relatives do not partake of any food while the dead lies in the house, neither are the rooms swept. After the finieral the house is swept, but the broom used must be thrown away and never again brought into the house. The custom also prevails of pitting on a table in the room where a person has died bread and salt and a glass of wine, for the belief is prevalent that after death the soul tarries a little while in the house, and may want to eat or drink

When the mourners return home, it, possible, by another route than that followed by the funeral procession, they all wash their hands before entering the house. Amongst the Slavonic peoples, besides the washing of the hands another custom is observed. A young member of the family meets the guests with a shovel containing a heap of burning coal. After washing his hands, everyone takes a small piece of burning coal, quickly passes it from one hand into the other, and then throws it behind him across his left shoulder.

The funeral procession is usually a large and impressive one. It is opened by boys carrying a cross and church banners, followed by others carrying big trays with eatables, especially kollica come the clergy in full canonicals in front of the coffin, which is carried uncovered, with the corpse exposed and the bead propped up on a pillow This is followed by the family, friends, and acquaintances, the women singing songs of lamenta tion Amongst the Greeks the procession is opened by a man who carries the lid of the coffm, holding it up right, the lid being covered with black velvet or white silk and being elaborately decorated. At the cemetery, after the priest has read the prescribed prayers, and blessed the corpse, pouring over it in the form of a cross red which mixed with obve oil, the coffin is lowered into the grave and everybody present throws a handful of

The funeral banquet, which is taken in the house, is very often a regular feast. In some parts, before starting to drink, everyone will spill a few drops of wine " for the soul of the dead " and will say " May God torgive his sins," or, " May the earth he light upon him". In towns these funeral baronets do not take place. but food, cakes, and money are distributed to poor people and beggars, both at the cemetery and at the house

The wailing is done in a certain rhythm, often in thyme, and the subject of these songs usually assumes the form of questions to the dead, such as have we done that you have left us? How do you think the house can get on without Shall I never hear again thy sweet voice " and similar questions will not sing any other songs during the whole year of mounting, neither will they wear jewels or adom themselves with flowers. CHAPTER LVI

GREECE, By CLIVE HOLLAND

THERE are a great many picturesque customs connected with three great events of life—birth, marriage

The costume of the Greek peasantry is extremely picturesque. The men wear short, full, pleated white skirts, red leither shock short red jackets and lez like caps. The packets are often richly trimmed.

The ceremony in connection with betrothal is very picturesque. A ring is exchanged as the pledge, and numerous friends sprinkle the affianced couple lavishly with the fragrant flowers of the

Then the sign of the cross is made, and the priest utters four exorcisms against temptation The godfather or godmother then proceeds on behalf of the child to renounce the Devil and all his works The Creed is then recited by the godparent. The water, which is tend, is blessed, and oil, which has also been blessed, is poured into it. It has been the duty of the godparent to anomt the baby with oil all over its body before it is handed to the priest, who forthwith plunges it into the font thrice, while reciting the baptismal words three times In some parts of Greece the godparent is requested both to blow and spit upon the child three times, after it has been immersed in the lont This is undoubtedly the survival of an ancient superstition common to other countries than

AN EASTER DANCE, MEGARA

In many districts of Greece there are found graceful and picturesque dances. Some of the steps and positions in them are derived from the ancient dances of classic times. The Easter dance of Megara has much in common with the ancient Hormus, which, though graceful and full of life, was a war dance invented by Lycurgus. It was danced by youths and maidens alternating, and represented a twisting chain.

A country wedding to a much more picturesque affair than the town one. The peasant girl, before she is married, must have three costumes one for everyday wear, one for Sunday and one to wear at festivals. The bridegroom and as many of his friends as he can gather together go and fetch her from her home, and the marriage takes place at his village, not at hers. The bridal party is often mounted on mules, and musicians go in front of the procession. After the ceremony, in some parts of Greece, the newly-married couples are greeted by a volley from the guns of the young men of the party as they come out of church, and someone usually carries the crowns used at the ceremony on a tray in front of the bride and bridegroom to their new home. On arriving at the house the bridegroom enters and fastens the door. Then the bride is lifted three or four times over the back of her mule and is afterwards led to the closed door, on the middle of which she smears a patch of honey. Retiring a little distance, she takes a pomegranate and throws it at the patch of honey until she breaks the pomegranate against it. If some of the seeds of the fruit do not stick to the honey, it is considered an evil onion. Then the bridegroom opens the door, offers her bread and salt, which she accepts, and, dipping a small piece of the bread into the salt, she eats it, without, however, entering the house. It is necessary for her to touch water and oil before she does so. After this the bridegroom hits her over the threshold, and she is placed in a corner with her back to the wall while all her houseau and other goods are piled up round her. She is compelled to remain there without speaking or moving, while the bridegroom and his friends are feasting. Even when the last of them has gone she must not raise her eves or speak until the bridegroom gives her permission to do so.

In Greece funerals usually take place the day after the death, or within two days. It is a common custom, though not a universal one, in Greece to carry the dead person through the streets with his face uncovered (see illustration on page 1174). The engin of this curious practice is said to date from the time when the Turks fulled in Greece, arms having often been smuggled in empty coffins in which dead were supposed to be carried for burial. Another custom connected with funerals is a Sabbath of Souls when the Church holds a solenin memorad service for the dead. This takes place the Saturday following the Sunday after Ascension Day, and people go out in great numbers to the cemetones, and even the officials. such and mayors other different people 11) towns, pay then respects to the memory of the dead

Easter is a great day in the Greek calendar At the early morning service on Good Fir day, which commences on the previous night, the so-called twelve Gospels are read, that is, the twelve passages from the four Gospels relating to the Passion of Our Lord whole population visits the churches in turn on Good Priday, and on this occasion the special side or satin cloths on which the representation of Our

At Easter the streets are illiminated, and in Athens the road from the Palace to the Cathedral is gay with flags and other decorations. Just before midnight the members of the royal family, who usually attend the service in the Cathedral, the Metropolitan, and the general ecclesiastical dignitaries take their stand, holding lighted candles Just as the clock is about to strike midnight there is a great pairse, and then the Metropolitan cries

And then outside there is heard the roar of the salute of a hundred and one guis, and the bells start ringing, and everyone rishes off to break then long Lenten fast. Every household sacrifices a lamb, and sprinkles the blood on the two side posts and upper door-post of the house

The most important festival for the individual Greek is not his brithday, but his "name day". Most Greeks are called after some patton saint, and then name day is that of his festival All the Nicholases keep thems on December 6th, and there are many of them, and the Helens on May 21st. There are several festivals of St. John, and so the sons of that name (Yannis) are able to have the choice of several days. But the most popular is the festival of St. John the Baptist on January 7th.

The blessing of the waters takes place at Epiphany, and is a very picturesque ceremony On the day before this event at, say, a harbour town, the priests go about blessing the houses with holy water and basil, and the Roman Catholics of the inland observe this custom at the same time. On the eye of the festival the boys of the town parade the streets with lanterns, singing religious songs appropriate to the The next morning at about cight 50.15011 o'clock the special service begins in the churches Towards the end of it the officiating priest utters prayers blessing the water which is contained in a large silver urn, on the lid of which is a dove. After the blessing is finished, there is a great riish with glasses to secure some of the blessed water. A procession is then formed down to the harboni, consisting of priests in their rich vestments, accompanied by men carrying a cross, the symbols of the Six-Winged Angels and silver plated lanterns. When the harboni is reached, an open space in the water has been reserved, in which numbers of people are already swimning about. Then the head priest throws the cross into the open water, and a struggle ensues for its recovery and possession. The one fortunate enough to get hold of it carries it round the town, collecting as he goes. Until the water has been blessed no vessel can sail, and there is a superstition that fine weather always follows the benediction.

The deeply religious nature of the Ancie t Greeks is still preserved and is shown in some of the dailest it church festivals. Here we have a picture of the commencement of an outdoor festival daile a midden form of an ild religious rife.

A NAGA WARRIOR IN FULL WAR DRESS

On his head is a chaplet of cane studded with how tunks as a protection against sword-cuts, and a crest of the tail leathers of this sacred horibill. In the enclobes are tred streamers of red dyed good's hair and cotton. A sash embroidered with white cowire shells shows that he has been in previous raids. His shield of tirer and bear skin, topped with plumes of crimson-dyed hair, is bigger than himself.

Assay, with its manifold wild tribes, many of which are still in the lower stages of savagery, presents a little ethnological world in itself Its fully recesses, standing up between China, India, Libet and Burma have come to be the last retired of scattered detachments of the primitive aborigines from each of those countries, driven into the wild glens by the advance of civilization up the fertile plants and lower valleys. There hemmed in among the moun tams and pressing on each other in their struggle for existence they are found as innumerable isolated diverse tribes and clairs, perpetually at feud with each other. Many of them are of the barbarous indeed kind usually associated with South Africa, and then head-hunting propensities and immderous raids are still a source of trouble to the settled British districts in their neighbourhood, and call for prinitive operations every few years, the latest of which were the recent Abor and Mishim exp ditions

Racially, these tribes belong mainly to the Mongohan type, though some of them are distinctly. Indonesian, from the Indo-Malayan region to the south. Die "Ahams" (or "Ahoms"), from whom our name of "Assam" is derived, are of Shan extraction from South-Western China, and were latterly the dominant race in the Brahmaphtra Valley, initil the British occupation.

Amongst the most curious customs of these rude tribes are the survivals from the primitive stage of human society, before the institution of marriage and before the rise of that domestic grouping which constitutes the "family". It is therefore desirable to keep these circumstances in view when examining many of their customs. We find amongst several of the tribes practices based upon the early stage of society when the women alone formed settlements and lived in them Amazon-tasheon by themselves with the children, whilst the hordes of primitive men still roamed over the earth as hunters in Lachelor groups by themselves. In this Mubrarchal stage, or maternal system of kinship, when the paternity of children was as yet unknown, the children gate, consisting of the parents and the children house" ("husband") and gains possession of the children, with kinship and descent in the paternal line. In others again of the more civilized tribes in intimate centact with the Indian driftles the paternal system has developed along the more familiar modern lines, where the pinchase becomes a mere symbol, and some clairs are adopting the opposite practice, where the lineband receives a downy, and even the Hindu "joint family" system, in which several families of common descent live together in one large household, and the sons and paternal nephews; have joint rights in the property with the father

A peculiar cutcome of the "paternal" system as operating amongst savage claims is that that system is made the excuse for many of the minderons rands by the wachke "Nagas". The people known under that Indian name comprise a heterogeneous series of tribes of more or less allied. Mongolian stock. The Nagas form separate claims, each of which with its septs lives apart in its own glen, and more or less at war with the rest of the world. Their blood-kiniship is of the exoganious kind, that is, the paternal group requires to marry outside were called after their mother and belonged to her clan, and property descended only in the female line. Thus in the Garo, Kasia, Bodo and Koch tribes the wife is still the head of the household, the children are hers and of her clan, not the husband's, and the husband himself by his marriage loses his identity and freedom, and must live with his wife's clan, and he is so meorporated with it as even to have to light against his own if need be, and all land and off it property, including that of the husband himself, becomes the property of the wife, and descends only in the female of maternal line.

Other tribes exhibit an advance on this stage towards the formation of "the family" group, which arose in the more settled stages of exist ence. In the system of "Marriage-by-Pinchase" the goods or money paid to the bride's people is a ransom to exempt him from the obligation of servitude to them, and gives the man the right to talle away his bride to his clair, and thus forms the beginning of the family aggrebic this the man becomes "the bond of the

in the forest, to which the mother retires alone or accompanied by a few women. A small but is ejected, there, in which the mother and child remain for a few days. The mother soon resumes her work, but in the case of the Miris the father is put to bed, and goes through the fiction of a mock childbirth, known to scientists as the Courade, as a second mother. He hes m bed for forty days after the birth of his child, and is fed as an invalid by the women, and he must abstain from all his usual luxunes and certain articles of diet, which would, it is believed, affect minimously his child. The Mins are in a transitional stage between the maternal and paternal systems. and the object of the above custom of Courade seems to be to proclaim the fact that the father has a direct relationship to his new born child. The Kasias, Kukis and "Kacha" Nagas are also in this intermediate stage. The naming also of the child amongst the "Kacha" or Ze-nii Nagas and Kasias is in the maternal fashion. Neither the father nor even the actual mother have any say in this matter, which is arranged by the old women and men of the village with the result that the father loses his own personal name and in future is called after his child, as "So and-so's Lather". A comical result of this method of nomenclature is that when a couple grow old without having had any children, the man is addressed as "No-child's Father" When the boy is initiated into the tribe he then may take part in the raids

All the unmarried young men in Naga villages live together in a great bachelois' hall or barrack hut called the morane.

One of these dancing testivals amonest the Ao Nagas is based on the idea of capting flic girls of each clan form a circle and dance slowly round at night whilst the young men of a different clan rush in with torches and each carries off the gul of his choice. Such seizure. however, leads only to a drinking forfeit which the girl has to give the young man in order to be set free. On marriage they affow then han to grow and the it up in a knot on the back of the head, and then necklaces of beads, shells, bracelets of cane, brass or silver are evidently intended to attract sintors, as they are almost invariably laid aside on marriage, and made over to immarried relatives.

The wedding ceremony is not usually elaborate. Among the Garos the bridegroom is carried by his friends to the house of the bride, where a cock and hen are sacrificed and the entrails consulted for an omen. But whether this turns out good or bad, the marriage takes place all the same. In this the priest, if there should be one, or if not, a friend, strikes the woman on the back with the dead cock and the man with the hen. The ceremony is over and the marriage declared valid beasting and rejoicing then toll w, and the young husband dwells with his wife in the house of her parents and becomes one of her clan A remarkable result of this intricate female kiiiship amongst the Garos is that the man who marries the tayourite daughter of a household has to marry his motherin law in the event of the death of his father-in-law may not marry his niece by his father's side, but only by his mother's side, and usually a son marries the sister of his sister's husband. The Mishim, on the other hand, is a polygamist, he has as many wives as he can afford to purchase, the price ranging from a pig to as much as twenty oven, and the number of his wives is a sign of his wealth. On his death, all the wives who survive become the property of his hen, excepting the mother of the hen should she be among these, who would go to the next of kin. Amongst some of the tribes is a probationary marriage for a few weeks, in which the couple go off on an expedition by themselves, and it mutually satisfied, the final marriage takes place.

I woman's position and power amongst the "maternal kinship," tribes, such as the Garos and Nasias, is very much greater than amongst civilized people It is the gul who proposes marriage, and the husband goes to live with her family. When she pleases she may turn away her husband and marry in general any other person and convey to him the whole property she possesses, as well as that of her former husband, and takes with her all the children. But the man cannot turn his wife away on any account unless he chooses to give up his entire property and the children as well. When a chief dies, his heir is not his own son, but his sister s son as chosen by his widow The fortimate youth, if married already, mimediately separates from his wife, who takes all his fortune and the children, while he marries the old woman and receives the dignity of the high rank. These acquisitions, however, do not always compensate for the disparity in age of the bride, and a boy who had been lately elevated to this dignity complained to a sympathetic English visitor that he had married an old toothless creature, while his cousin, although poor, had a pretty young girl-wife with whom he could play all day long! On the other hand, under the "paternal" system of the Nagas, the wives lead a life of very hard drudgery.

Most of the tribe are in the lowest stage of religious b(hef ("ammism"), in which they suppose that all things, even
